If the registration certificate in the office of the Bureau of Vital Statistics shall show that the statement of either applicant as to race or color is untrue, the report of the State Board of Health shall so state, and in such case the ordinary shall not issue a marriage license to the applicants until the truth of such statements of the applicants shall have been determined in a legal proceeding brought against the ordinary to compel the issuing of such license. If the report from the State Board of Health shall show that the applicants are not registered, and if the State Bureau of Vital Statistics shall have no information as to the race or color of said applicants, the ordinary shall issue the marriage license if he shall have no evidence or knowledge that such marriage would be illegal. If one of the applicants shall be registered with the State Bureau of Vital Statistics, and the other applicant shall not be so registered, if the records of the Bureau of Vital Statistics shall contain no information to disprove the statements of either applicant as to color or race, the ordinary shall issue the marriage license, if he shall have no evidence or knowledge that such marriage would be illegal: Provided, that where each party is registered and such registration certificate is on file in the office of the ordinary of the county where application for marriage license is made, it shall not be necessary for the ordinary to obtain any information from the State Bureau of Vital Statistics; and Provided further, that when any person who has previously registered as required herein shall move to another county, he may file with the ordinary of the county of his new residence a certified copy of his registration certificate, which shall have the same effect as if such registration had been made originally in said county. (Acts 1927, p. 275; 1933, p. 12).

310 NONRESIDENTS, APPLICATION BY. - Where any application for a marriage license shall show that such applicant was not born in this State and is not registered with the Bureau of Vital Statistics of this State, the ordinary shall forward a copy of such application to the State Board of Health of this State, and shall also forward a copy of the application to the clerk of the superior or circuit court, as the case may be, of the county of the applicant's birth with the request that the statements therein contained be verified. If no answer shall be received from such clerk or Bureau of Vital Statistics within 10 days, the ordinary shall issue the license if he shall have no evidence or knowledge that such marriage would be illegal. If an answer shall be received within ten days, showing the statement of such applicant to be untrue, the ordinary shall withhold the issuing of the license until the truth of such statements of the applicant shall have been determined in a legal proceeding brought against the ordinary to compel the issuing of such license. In all cases where answers shall be received from such clerk or Bureau of Vital Statistics, a copy of the answer shall be forwarded to the State Board of Health of this State. (Acts 1927, p. 276; 1933, p. 12).

311 RETURN OF MARRIAGE LICENSE. - When a marriage license shall be issued by the ordinary, it shall be returned to the ordinary by the officer or minister solemnizing the marriage and forwarded by the ordinary to the State Board of Health, to be permanently retained by said Board. (Acts 1927, p. 277; 1933, p. 12).

312 "WHITE PERSON" DEFINED. - The term "white person" shall include only persons of the white or Caucasian race, who have no ascertainable trace of either Negro, African, West Indian, Asiatic Indian, Mongolian, Japanese, or Chinese blood in their veins. No person, any one of whose ancestors has been duly registered with the State Bureau of Vital Statistics as a colored person or person of color, shall be deemed to be a white person. (Acts 1927, p. 277).

313 REPORT OF VIOLATION OF CHAPTER. DUTY OF STATE BOARD OF HEALTH. - If any case of a marriage in violation of the provisions of this Chapter shall be reported to the State Board of Health, it shall investigate such report and shall turn over to the Attorney General the information obtained through such investigation. (Acts 1927, p. 278; 1933, p. 12).

314 BIRTH OF LEGITIMATE CHILD OF WHITE PARENT AND COLORED PARENT, REPORT OF, AND PROSECUTION. - When any birth certificate, showing the birth of a legitimate child to parents one of whom is colored, shall be forwarded to the Bureau of Vital Statistics, it shall be the duty of the State Board of Health to report the same to the Attorney General of the State, with full information concerning the same. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to institute criminal proceedings against the parents of such child for any violation of the provisions of this Chapter which may have been committed. (Acts 1927, p. 278; 1933, p. 12).

315 ATTORNEY GENERAL, DUTY TO ENFORCE CHAPTER. - It shall be the duty of the Attorney General of this State, as well as the duty of the solicitor general of the superior court where such violation shall occur, to prosecute each violation of any of the provisions of this Chapter, when the same shall be reported to him by the State Board of Health. If the Attorney General shall fail or refuse to prosecute any such violation so reported to him, the same shall be grounds for impeachment, and it shall be the duty of the State Board of Health to institute impeachment proceedings in such case. (Acts 1927, p. 278; 1933, p. 12).

9901 PERFORMING MARRIAGE CEREMONY ILLEGALLY. - If any minister of the gospel, judge, or justice of the peace shall join together in matrimony any man and woman, without a license or publication of banns, as provided by law, or where either of the parties within his own knowledge shall be an idiot or lunatic, or subject to any other disability which would render such contract or marriage improper and illegal, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. (Cobb, 818, 819).

Cross-reference. - General principles relating to marriage, Chapter 53-1.

9902 INTERMARRIAGE OF WHITE AND COLORED PEOPLE. - If any officer shall knowingly issue a marriage license to persons, either of whom is of African descent and the other a white person, or if any officer or minister of the gospel shall join such persons in marriage, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. (Acts 1865-6, p. 241).

Cross-reference. - Miscegenation prohibited, 53-106.

Marriages between white persons and persons of African descent are null and void; this section not repealed by, nor inconsistent with, that part of Constitution which declares that "the social status of the citizen shall never be the subject of legislation." (2-118). 39/321.

9903 MISCEGENATION, PENALTY. - Any person, white or colored, who shall marry or go through a marriage ceremony in violation of the provision of section 53-106 shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one year and not more than two years. (Acts 1927, p. 277).

9904 FALSE STATEMENT IN APPLICATION FOR MARRIAGE LICENSE; PENALTY. - Any person who shall make or cause to be made a false statement as to race or color of himself or parents, in any application for a marriage license, shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than five years. (Acts 1927, pp. 272, 277).

9905 PERFORMING MARRIAGE CEREMONY ILLEGALLY. - Any civil officer, minister, or official of any church, sect, or religion, authorized to perform a marriage ceremony, who shall wilfully or knowingly perform any marriage ceremony in violation of the terms of Chapter 53-3, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. (Acts 1927, pp. 272, 278).

9906 REFUSAL TO EXECUTE REGISTRATION CERTIFICATE, ETC. - Any person who shall refuse to execute the registration certificate as provided in Chapter 53-3 or who shall refuse to give the information required in the execution of the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Each such refusal shall constitute a separate offense. (Acts 1927, p. 274).

9907 FALSE REGISTRATION. - Any person who shall wilfully or knowingly make or cause to be made a registration certificate false as to color or race, in violation of section 53-306, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one year and not more than two years. (Acts 1927, p. 274).

9908 ORDINARY'S NONCOMPLIANCE WITH CHAPTER 53-3. PENALTY. - Any ordinary who shall issue a marriage license without complying with each and every provision of Chapter 53-3 shall be guilty of and punished as for a misdemeanor. (Acts 1927, p. 277).

Editorial note. - See editorial note following 53-301.

54 DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

110 DUTIES OF COMMISSIONER AND ASSISTANTS. - The Commissioner of Commerce and Labor and his lawful assistants shall collect and collate information and statistics concerning labor and its relation to capital showing labor conditions throughout the State, the hours of labor, the earnings of laborers, and their educational, moral financial condition, and the best means of promoting their mental, moral, and material welfare; shall investigate the cause and extent of labor shortage, and the migration of labor; shall also collect and collate information and statistics concerning the location and capacity of mills, factories, workshops, and other industries, and actual output of manufactured products, and also the character and amount of labor employed; the kind and quantity of raw material annually used by them, and the capital invested therein, and such other information and statistics concerning the natural resources of the State and the industrial welfare of the citizens as may be deemed necessary and of interest and benefit to the public, and by dissemination of such data to advertise the various industrial and natural resources of Georgia in order to attract desirable settlers and to bring capital into the State. The Department of Industrial Relations is also charged with the following duties:

1. As soon as practicable the Commissioner shall organize a division of labor of free employment bureau, having for its purpose the listing of the names of all persons desiring employment in this State and the endeavor to secure employment for such persons, and listing of the names of such persons, firms, or corporations applying for labor and the endeavor to supply the demand. In conducting the division of labor the Commissioner is herewith authorized and empowered to assist and act in concert with any person or persons, county organization, municipal or Governmental agency, having for its purpose the distribution of labor in this State, not conducted for profit, and to cooperate with similar exchanges in other States and with the United States employment service; and in every other way the Commissioner is charged with the duty of endeavoring to be of assistance to both employer and employee, and of working in harmony with others having a like end in view, and for which no remuneration is received. For securing employment for those who wish employment and for securing labor for those who need help there shall be no charge whatever made or accepted, directly or indirectly, by any person connected with the Department of Industrial Relations. All officials of the State and the various counties are herewith charged with the duty of lending such aid and assistance as may be called for by the Commissioner: Provided, said Commissioner may inquire into the causes of strikes and lockouts and other disagreements between employers and employees, and if practicable offer his good offices to the contending parties with a view to bringing about friendly and satisfactory adjustments thereof.

2. The Commissioner shall exercise jurisdiction over each person, firm or corporation acting as a private employment agency or intelligence bureau, hereafter referred to as agency; shall, as frequently as may be necessary, examine into the condition of each agency; shall require each agent to make application for license to do business which application must be indorsed by two taxpayers in the county where such agency proposes to conduct business, said license to be granted by the charged, and the filing of a bond in the sum of $500 for the faithful performance of duty, said license to be renewed annually. The Commissioner shall require each agency to report to him once a month in writing, showing the names, addresses and the number of persons for whom positions were secured, where secured, the kind of position, the pay of same, the amount of fee collected and the amount still to be collected. Nothing in this paragraph shall authorize any employment agency or persons with such agency, or any employee thereof, to act as an emigrant agent. If any agent shall be found to be violating the law, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to immediately proceed to have such person presented to the proper authorities for prosecution and to cancel the license of such agency to do business.

3. The commissioner shall exercise jurisdiction over each person, firm or corporation acting as an emigrant agent or agency, hereinafter referred to as emigrant agent; shall require each emigrant agent to make application for license to do business said application to be indorsed by two taxpayers and accompanied by a bond of $1,000 for the faithful performance of duty, and the payment of such tax as may be required by law. Each emigrant agent shall make a daily report to the Commissioner, showing the names, addresses and number of people carried out of the State, the points to which they have been carried, the kind and character of work secured for them, the pay to be received by them, the fee charged them or to be collected and from whom. The emigrant agent shall show clearly by whom employed, if paid a salary, or from whom he receives a commission, and how much. The Commissioner shall inspect the office and work of each emigrant agent as often as may be necessary and, if any emigrant agent shall be found to be violating the law, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to immediately proceed to have such person presented to the proper authorities for prosecution and to cancel the license to do business. Each emigrant agent must secure annually a license to do business. In contemplation of this section, the emigrant agent is any person who shall solicit or attempt to procure labor in this State beyond the limits of the same.

9902 ACTING AS EMIGRANT AGENT WITHOUT LICENSE. - Any person who shall solicit or procure emigrants, without first procuring a license as required by section 54-110, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. An emigrant agent is a person who solicits or attempts to procure labor in this State to be employed beyond the limits of the same. An emigrant is any person who has been solicited, persuaded, enticed, or employed to leave the State to be employed or worked beyond the limits of the same. (Acts 1877, p. 120; 1920 p. 37; 1929 p. 176).

74 LEGITIMATE CHILDREN

102 COLORED CHILDREN LEGITIMATE, WHEN. - Every colored child born before March 9, 1866 is hereby declared to be the legitimate child of his mother; but such child is the legitimate child of his colored father only when born within what was regarded as a state of wedlock, or when the parents were living together as husband and wife. (Acts 1865-6, pp. 239, 240; 1866, pp. 156, 157).

Burden of proof: When plaintiff claimed to be heir of deceased person and it appeared that plaintiff's father, the deceased, and his mother had been slaves, and that plaintiff was born prior to March 9, 1866, burden was on plaintiff to show that he was his father's legitimate son under this section. 143/671 (1) (85 S. E. 870).

Evidence: Where, on trial of injunction case, one issue was whether one of predecessors in title of defendant was legitimate child of his father and mother (who were slaves), it was competent to permit witness for defendant to testify that at time of his birth in 1859 father and mother were "living there as man and wife." 150/147 (1) (103 S. E. 251).

Father has right of parent over colored child who was born before emancipation, while parents lived in what was regarded as a state of wedlock, and who has been acknowledged by his father as his child. 41/220.

Parents separated before Act of 1866, and child remained with mother, she was entitled to control of it; but if she voluntarily yielded control to father, she could not afterwards resume it without his consent. 45/558.

Colored child acknowledged by father, who died between passage of act of Mar. 9 1866 and passage of Act of December 12, 1866, entitled to inherit as legitimate child of father. 40/339.

Inheritance: When Negro woman had two children born to or before March 9, 1866, by different fathers, both by this section were made her legitimate children, capable of inheriting from each other. 143/342 (3) (85 S. E. 105)....

77 PRISON COMMISSION, ETC.

315 DISCRETION OF COMMISSION AS TO EMPLOYMENT ON STATE FARM; SEPARATION OF RACES. - In exercising their discretion as to what convicts shall be employed upon the State farm or farms, and in awarding the labor of convicts to counties and municipalities, it shall be the duty of the Prison Commission, where practicable, to employ whites and Negroes in separate institutions and locations, and they shall be provided with separate eating and sleeping apartments: Provided, that the Prison Commission shall have authority, in their discretion, to place any number of said convicts on the State farm, to be used on said farm to do farm work or such other labor on said farm as the Prison Commission may deem best; and the Comission may, at any time, when such labor is needed, upon the request of the authorities in charge, place as many as 50 of such convicts at work upon the property of any State institution. (Acts 1908, pp. 1119, 1123).

Cross-reference. - Chaining or confining white and colored convicts together, see 77-9904.

317 SEGREGATION OF CLASSES OF PRISONERS. - The Prison Commission shall provide: For the keeping of the male and female convicts separate and apart, so that they may not come in contact with each other; for the keeping, separate and apart from the other inmates of the prison, of minors under the age of 15 years; for the keeping separate and apart of white and colored convicts when not at work, and when actually engaged in work to be kept separate as far as practicable. (Acts 1897, pp. 71, 73).

Cross-reference. - Chaining or confining white and colored convicts together, see 77-9904.

Editorial note. - The temporary provisions of the above section as it appears in the Code of 1910, relating to the purchase of a State farm, etc., have been omitted.

Stated. 164/211 (133 S. E. 206).

613 SEPARATION OF RACES. - The white and colored inmates shall be kept separate and distinct in all work and study. (Acts 1919, p. 376).

Cross-reference. - See 77-9904 and cross-references.

(This section refers to the Georgia Training Schools; specifically, it refers to the Georgia State Training School for Boys.)

9904 CHAINING OR CONFINING WHITE AND COLORED CONVICTS TOGETHER. - No person controlling convicts shall confine white and colored convicts together, or work them chained together, or chain them together going to or from their work, or at any other time. Any person and each member of a firm violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. (Acts 1890-1, p. 213).

Cross-references. - Duty of prison commission to provide separately for white and colored convicts, see 77-315, 77-317. White and colored inmates of Georgia Training School for boys, see 77-613.

79 IN GENERAL (PERSONS OF COLOR, WHO ARE; CITIZENS; ALIENS)

103 PERSONS OF COLOR, WHO ARE. - All Negroes, mulattoes, mestizos, and their descendants, having any ascertainable trace of either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in their veins, and all descendants of any person having either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in his or her veins, shall be known in this State as persons of color. (Acts 1865-6, p. 239; 1927, p. 272.)

Cross-references. - Registration of individuals as to race, see Title 53, Husband and Wife, Chapter 53-3 and 53-9903. " White person" defined, see 53-312.

Anomalous condition of post-bellum property rights of Negroes, construed on broad principles of equity. 73/187.

Equities created in one's favor when he was slave, right to enforce, does not extend to action for injuries or for wages. 38/655.

Evidence as to race. 39/232; see 33 Ga. Sup. 22.

Indictment against Negro need not describe him as colored person. 44/263; see 48/30.

Office: Negro can hold. 39/232, 273.

Witnesses: Persons of color competent as. 35/75.

205 RIGHTS OF CITIZENS. - Among the rights of citizens are the enjoyment of personal security, of personal liberty, private property and the disposition thereof, the elective franchise, the right to hold office unless disqualified by the Constitution and laws, to appeal to the courts, to testify as a witness, to perform any civil function, and to keep and bear arms.

Cross-reference. - Who may sue and testify, see 79-305. Comity of States, see 102-110. Power of testators, see 113-106. Due process of law, see Const., Art. I, Sec. I, Par. III (2-103); Const. U. S., Amend. V (1-805). Social status never subject of legislation, see Const., Art. I, Sec. I. Par. XVIII (2-118).

302 ALIENS, WHO ARE. - Aliens are the subjects of foreign governments, not naturalized under the laws of the United States.

Cross-reference. - Power of Congress to establish uniform rule of naturalization, see Const. U. S., Art. I, Sec. VIII (1-125).

92-5 AGENTS, AGENCIES, AND BROKERS

506 EMIGRANT AGENTS. - Each emigrant agent and each employee of such agent doing business in this State shall pay $1,000 for each county in which such agent or employee may do or offer to do business: Provided, that no emigrant agent or employee shall take or attempt to take from this State any person until after first giving bond to be accepted and approved by the Commissioner of Commerce and Labor, conditioned to pay any valid debt owing by said person to any citizen of this State. (Acts 1927, p. 72; 1935, p. 34).

Cross-reference. - Regulations as to emigrant agents, see section 54-9902.

Constitutionality of license tax imposed upon emigrant agents by general tax Act for 1899 and 1900 (Acts 1898, p. 21), upheld. 179 U. S. 270 (45 L. Ed. 186; 21 Sup. Ct. 128) affirming 110/584 (35 S. E. 699).

Definition: "Emigrant agent" means person engaged in hiring laborers in this State to be employed beyond limits of same. 110/584 (1) (35 S. E. 699); and see 110/595 (36 S. E. 93).

One who comes into this State and employs on his own behalf laborers to work for him outside the State is not an "emigrant agent." 114/53 (39 S.E. 913).
Emigrant agent is one engaged in hiring laborers in this State, to be employed beyond limits of State, and who makes that work his business or occupation; evidence here did not show that defendant was engaged in business of an emigrant agent. 23 App. 1 (97 S. E. 274).

507 EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES. - All employment agencies or bureaus doing business in this State shall pay $50 for each county in which they have an office. (Acts 1927, p. 72; 1935, p. 35).

92-63 BLANKS, LISTS, AND DIGESTS

6307 ENTRY ON DIGEST OF NAMES OF COLORED PERSONS. - The tax receivers shall place the names of the colored taxpayers, in each militia district of the county, upon the tax digest in alphabetical order. Names of colored and white taxpayers shall be made out separately on the tax digest. (Acts 1894, p. 31).

Editorial note. - Acts 1935, p. 476, requires the tax receivers in all counties in this state having a population 200,000 or more by the United States census of 1930 or any future United States census to list in the white and colored/tax digests respectively the names of the taxpayers in continuous alphabetical order without segregation by militia districts or other local subdivisions except independent school districts.

6308 RETURNS BY RECEIVERS AND COLLECTORS OF TAXES PAID BY COLORED PEOPLE. - The several receivers of tax returns and tax collectors in this State, or other officers performing similar duties, shall make a report to the Comptroller General of the character and amount of all taxes returned or paid by colored taxpayers in this State, and the Comptroller General in his annual report shall make a general exhibit of the character and amount of the taxes so returned. (Acts 1874, p. 109).

Cross-reference. - Report of Comptroller General to Governor, see section 40-1101.

105 LIBEL AND SLANDER

Cross-reference. - Criminal libel and defamation of virtuous female, see 26-2101 to 26-2104.

Formerly this was not the rule; special damages had to be alleged before the Act of 1859. 26/606.

113 INHERITABLE PROPERTY AND RELATIVE RIGHTS OF HEIRS AND ADMINISTRATOR

903 RULES OF INHERITANCE. - The following rules shall determine who are the heirs at law of a deceased person: (Acts 1882-3, p. 47).

1. Upon the death of the husband without lineal descendants, the wife is his sole heir, and upon the payment of his debts, if any, may take possession of his estate without administration.

Cross-references.- Permanent alimony, effect of, upon wife's interest in husband's estate, see 30-218. Wages of deceased employee paid to widow, see 66-103 to 66-105. Deposit in bank not over $300, see 13-2048.

Administrator cannot recover land from widow by merely proving title in husband at his death. 108/354 (33 S. E. 1009).

Administrator of father could not recover land from widow of son, without showing order to sell, or prior possession, or necessity for possession to pay debts and distribute. 132/455 (64 S. E. 467); see 134/49, 50 (67 S. E. 435).

Another husband: Where man who was married to woman who had living husband died, no title to his property passed to her, and deed by her purporting to convey property of decedent was without effect, and her grantee took no title as against heirs of decedent. 146/367 (1) (91 S. E. 115).

Children: There being none, widow was heir of husband. 33/409

Collateral heirs: Upon death of man leaving widow but no lineal descendants, his estate descends to widow by inheritance, and death of widow, without known heirs, will not vest her inheritance in collateral heirs of her deceased husband. 147/138 (4) (93 S. E. 93).

2. Brothers and sisters of the intestate shall stand in the second degree, and shall inherit, if there is no widow, child, or representative of a child. The half-blood, both on the paternal and maternal side, shall inherit equally with the whole blood. The children or grandchildren of brothers and sisters deceased shall represent and stand in the place of their deceased parents, but there shall be no representation further than this among their collaterals. If all the brothers and sisters be dead at the death of the intestate, then the distribution is between the nephews and nieces, per capita; and if any of the nephews and nieces be dead, leaving children distribution is to be made as though the nephews and nieces were allalive, the children of the deceased nephew or niece standing in place of the parent. (Act 1804, Cobb, 291; Acts 1859, p. 35; 1931, pp. 114, 115. 45 Ga. 574, 580).

Cross reference. - Inheritance by and from illegitimates, see 113-904, 113-905.

Editorial note. - The last sentence of this subdivision was taken from the decision in 45/574, 580.

Brothers and sisters inherit when no surviving husband, wife, child, or lineal descendant, half-blood on paternal side being equal with whole-blood. 124/552 (2) (52 S. E. 922).

First Cousin of half-blood on maternal side takes in preference to second cousin of whole-blood. 112/557 (37 S. E. 984).

Grandchildren of an aunt are in third degree and are heirs in preference to great-grandchildren of a brother who are in fourth degree. 60/193 (3). Grandchild of brother or sister stands simply in father's place; if nephews and nieces all dead, distribution is per capita; if any of them be living property distributed as though all living, children of each one deceased standing in place of parent. 45/574, 579.

As related to both children and grandchildren of brother or sister of intestate, division must be per stirpes, the children as representing respective deceased sisters here, and the grandchildren as representing deceased nephews or nieces. 175/569 (165 S. E. 554).

Sole surviving brother of intestate who left no wife, child, or descendant of child, was not entitled to entire estate to exclusion of children and grandchildren of deceased brothers and sisters of intestate. 179/615 (176 S. E. 646).

Illegitimates: Children of, took per capita, just as those of legitimates would have done. 45/574; see 78/770 (3 S. E. 666); 143-342, 345 (85 S. E. 105)

68 MOTOR CARRIERS

504 CERTIFICATE OF PUBLIC CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY; TERMS AND CONDITIONS; TRANSFER; REVOCATION; TERM; RENEWAL. - (a) No motor carrier shall operate without first obtaining from the Georgia Public Service Commission, after hearing under the provisions of this Chapter, a certificate of public convenience and necessity, pursuant to findings to the effect that the public requires such operation ....

509 BONDS OF HOLDERS OF CERTIFICATES; INDEMNITY INSURANCE IN LIEU OF BONDS; SELF INSURANCE. - No certificate shall be issued or continued in operation unless the holder thereof shall give bond with adequate security for the protection, in case of passenger vehicles, of the passengers and baggage carried, and of the public against injury proximately caused by the negligence of such motor carrier, its servants or agents .... The Commission shall approve, determine, and fix the amount of such bonds, and shall prescribe the provisions and limitations thereof, and such bonds shall be for the benefit of, and subject to suit or action thereon by, any person who shall sustain actionable injury or loss protected thereby.

513 CARRIAGE OF COLORED PASSENGERS. - Motor carriers may confine themselves to carrying either white or colored passengers; or they may provide different motor vehicles for carrying white and colored passengers; and they may carry white and colored passengers in the same vehicle, but only under such conditions of separation of the races as the Commission may prescribe. (Acts, 1931)

II

THE MUNICIPAL CODE OF ATLANTA

13 AIRPORTS

101 AUTHORITY TO PURCHASE, OWN, AND OPERATE AIRPORTS WITHIN OR WITHOUT CITY LIMITS: POLICE JURISDICTION. - The City of Atlanta is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase, own and operate municipal landing fields for the reception, storage, and operation of airplanes; also for the use of the government in the air mail service; and such fields may be located either within or without the limits of said city, and when so purchased and defined, the City of Atlanta is given police jurisdiction over the land so acquired, except as to any part thereof which may be located in some municipality. (Acts 1929, pp. 779, 780).

Cross-reference. - Aviation ordinance, see Chapter 36, 36-101 et seq.

Editorial note. - The sections of this Chapter are taken from an amendment to the city's charter. After the charter was so amended, the General Assembly passed the Uniform Airports Law. For this law see Acts 1933, p. 102; Code of Georgia of 1933, Chapter 11-2. See also Thrasher v. Atlanta, 178 Georgia 514 (173 S. E. 817), construing the charter amendment.

The seeming conflict of the exception of this section with the provisions of other sections of the Chapter appears also in the Act as officially published.

101 REGISTRATION BY ALIEN OF FIREARMS IN HIS POSSESSION. - Every foreign born alien living within or coming into the City of Atlanta, having or gaining possession of any firearms, such as pistols, rifles, shotguns, machine guns, or any other such instruments of any kind and character, shall register same with the Chief of Police, giving such information as may be required by said officer and those working under his orders. Aliens living in the city shall register same with the Chief of Police, giving such information as may be required by said officer or those working under his orders. Aliens living in the city shall register such weapons at once. Aliens coming into Atlanta and bearing or possessing any of the firearms described herein shall register same within 24 hours after arrival within the city. (June 18, 1940).

102 DISPOSITION OF FIREARMS BY ALIEN. - After any such firearms as are described herein have been registered with the Chief of Police, no person shall dispose of same without a permit from the Chief of Police. Application for such a permit shall give such information as may be required by the Chief of Police. No one shall purchase or come into possession of such firearms from any alien without notifying the Chief of Police of his intention a reasonable time in advance and securing permission from said officer to obtain possession of same. (June 18, 1940).

104 PENALTIES. - Any person violating or failing to comply with any of the foregoing provisions respecting firearms, making any false statements, refusing to answer any questions or withholding any such information as may be required by the Chief of Police shall be deemed guilty of an offense and upon conviction thereof in the Recorder's Court, shall be fined $500 and sentenced to 60 days in the city stockade, either or both penalties to be inflicted at the discretion of the Recorder. In case of conviction, it shall be mandatory on the Recorder to impose the maximum fine or other punishment provided herein. (June 18, 1940).

122 NO DOGS ALLOWED IN GRANT PARK. - It shall not be lawful for any person to permit his dog within the limits of Grant Park. Any person violating this provision shall, upon conviction thereof by the Recorder, pay a fine not exceeding $10 and costs, or be imprisoned for not more than 30 days, in the discretion of the Recorder.

37 BARBERS AND BEAUTICIANS

129 BARBER SHOPS MUST SHOW ON SIGNS WHETHER WHITE OR COLORED PERSONS ARE SERVED THEREIN. - It shall be the duty of all persons conducting barber shops to show on their barber shop signs whether white persons only, colored persons only, or both races are served in such shops, excepting in such buildings where no signs are displayed. A violation of this ordinance shall be punished upon conviction in the Recorder's Court by a fine not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding 30 days, in the discretion of the court.

130 COLORED BARBERS FORBIDDEN TO SERVE WHITE WOMEN OR GIRLS. - No colored barber shall serve as a barber white women or white girls; meaning by this the doing of any of the work barbers ordinarily perform and as defined by the law of the State of Georgia. Any barber or the manager of any barber shop, violating this section, shall be deemed guilty of an offense and on conviction thereof in the Recorder's Court shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $200, or sentenced to work on the public works of the city for not exceeding 30 days, either or both penalties to be inflicted in the discretion of the Recorder. (February 16, 1926).

Editorial note. - The ordinance from which this section is codified also forbade colored barbers to work for white children under the age of 14 years. That part of the ordinance was held unconstitutional in Chaires v. Atlanta, 164 Ga. 755 (139 S. E. 559). The part of the ordinance here codified was not attacked in the Chaires case, and the court made no ruling on its constitutionality.

40 BOXING AND WRESTLING

102 SECRETARY. RULES AND REGULATIONS. Said Committee (Municipal buildings and Athletic Committee) is empowered to elect a Secretary to assist it in the discharge of its duties respecting boxing and wrestling contests. The term of office of the Secretary shall be one year. The Committee shall make rules and regulations governing the administration of their office as a boxing commission and shall formulate rules and regulations for the holding and governing of boxing and sparring and wrestling contests in the City of Atlanta, which it may change or alter from time to time as may be deemed expedient. (February 22, 1927; May 4, 1932).

104 JURISDICTION OVER BOXING AND SPARRING AND WRESTLING MATCHES OR EXHIBITIONS.- Said Committee shall have the sole direction, management, control, and jurisdiction over all boxing and sparring and wrestling matches or exhibitions to be conducted, held, or given within the city; and said matches or exhibitions shall not be held or given except in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, and the rules and regulations which may be established or promulgated from time to time by the Committee. (February 22, 1927).

42 CEMETERIES

302 BURIAL OF COLORED PERSONS ON GROUND SET APART FOR WHITE PERSONS PROHIBITED.- The officer in charge shall not bury, or allow to be buried, any colored persons upon ground set apart for or used for the burial of white persons.

53 HEALTH DEPARTMENT AND HEALTH REGULATIONS

134 SEPARATE TOILETS FOR MEN AND WOMEN IN MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENTS. - The owner, manager, or agent in charge of any factory, workshop or manufacturing establishment in the City of Atlanta shall supply separate toilets and washrooms for girls and women, apart from toilets and washrooms used by men and boys in such places. At least one toilet shall be installed for every 20 people, or fraction of said number, of either sex. Said toilets shall be placed in separate parts of the building for the use of the different sexes, and shall be cleaned at least once a day and kept free from foul odors or accumulations of filth of any kind therein.

137 PENALTIES. - Violations of any provision of this Article, for which no other penalty is specifically provided, shall be punishable by fine not to exceed $100 and costs, or imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or both, in the discretion of the Recorder.

603 SEPARATE RESTAURANTS FOR WHITE AND COLORED PEOPLE. - All persons licensed to conduct a restaurant, shall serve either white people exclusively or colored people exclusively and shall not sell to the two races within the same room or serve the two races anywhere under the same license: the purpose of this section being that each licensee shall serve either one race or the other and that no license shall authorize sale to the two races at or near the same place.

604 LICENSE SHALL DESIGNATE RACE TO BE SERVED. - The Clerk of Council in issuing licenses for restaurants shall designate therein the character of trade authorized to be served under each license, as "for white people only" or "for colored people only."

605 RESTAURANTS TO DISPLAY SIGNS SHOWING WHICH RACE SERVED. - Each license shall display prominently in front of his place of business a notice as follows: "Licensed to serve white people only" or "Licensed to serve colored people only," so that the public may be informed of the character of trade served at each such place.

606 PENALTIES. - Maximum $100 fine or 30 days on public works for violation of preceding sections.

55 INTOXICATING LIQUORS

217 SALE OF WINE AND BEER TO WHITE AND COLORED PEOPLE IN SAME ROOM FORBIDDEN.- All persons licensed to conduct the business of selling wine and beer or either of them shall serve either white people exclusively or colored people exclusively and shall not sell to the two races within the same room at any time: it being the purpose of this section that each dealer in wine and beer or either of them shall serve only one race and that if the two races are served there must be two separate and distinct rooms for that purpose and the licensee must procure separate licenses therefor. Each dealer in wine and beer or either of them shall display prominently in front of his place of business a notice as follows: "Licensed to serve white people only"; or "Licensed to serve colored people only"; so that the public may be informed of the character of trade served in such place. When an application for license is filed, the applicant shall state in the application the class or character of people to be served, namely, whether or not he proposes to sell white people only or colored people only. Any person selling wine or beer or either of them in violation of any of the terms of this section shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the City of Atlanta and on conviction thereof in the Recorder's Court shall be fined not exceeding $100, or sentenced to work on the public works not exceeding 30 days, either or both penalties to be inflicted in the discretion of the Recorder. It is further provided that a violation of the provisions of this section by any dealer in wine or beer or either of them, either personally or through agents or employees, shall ipso facto work a forfeiture of the license; it being the purpose of this provision that a conviction of any such dealer in the Recorder's Court shall immediately work a forfeiture of the license. Any person continuing to sell beer or wine or either of them after the forfeiture of the license, as hereinabove provided, shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the City of Atlanta and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $100 or sentenced to work on the public works for not exceeding 30 days, either or both penalities to be inflicted in the discretion of the Recorder. (November 16, 1937).

58 LIBRARY

101 MANAGEMENT OF CARNEGIE LIBRARY IN BOARD OF TRUSTEES; POWER OF BOARD. - The management of Carnegie Library is hereby invested in the Board of Trustees of said Library, who shall have power to prescribe rules for the government of said Library, and to change the same from time to time, if they so desire.

Cross-reference. - Charter provision requiring appropriation for Library, see 19-507.

107 CENSORSHIP OF MOTION PICTURES BY BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CARNEGIE LIBRARY. - No person shall exhibit, or cause to be exhibited in any motion picture theatre any motion picture, unless it shall have been first approved by the Board of Trustees of Carnegie Library or the Committee on Censorship appointed by said Board: Provided, however, that this section shall not apply to any exhibition of motion pictures given for purely educational, charitable, paternal or religious purposes, by any religious association, fraternal society, library, museum, public or private school or any institution of learning, where no admission is charged.

Cross-reference. - Charter authorization for Board of Censorship, see 5-305. Unlawful to exhibit indecent motion pictures, see 66-504.

108 DUTY OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES TO ENFORCE CENSORSHIP OF MOTION PICTURES. - It is especially the duty of the Board of Trustees of Carnegie Library, or the Board of Censorship appointed by said Board, to see that the provisions of section 58-107 and of sections 66-504 to 66-507 inclusive, are observed and to provide some method by which any violation of same may be properly prosecuted and conviction insisted upon in all cases where the evidence shows that the defendants are guilty.

59 HOTELS

323 BELL BOYS AND HOUSE DETECTIVES TO OBTAIN PERMITS. - All employees of hotels performing the duty of bell boys or house detectives shall obtain the permit herein required before entering upon such employment. Each of said employees shall file a statement with the Clerk of Council to the effect that he is, or expects to be, employed in one of the employments named, stating his correct name and giving his address, together with his age and former employment. When this statement is filed with the Clerk, said Clerk shall thereupon issue a permit to such employee to follow the employment set out in said statement: Provided, that before said Clerk shall issue said permit, the statement or application shall have endorsed thereon a statement, or be accompanied by a letter, signed by three reputable citizens, none of whom has any interest in the hotel where said employee is to work or serve, showing the good character of applicant. The managers or persons in charge of the hotel where said employees operate shall keep a book or list of said employees, which book or list shall show the correct name of said employees and their addresses, and which shall be subject to inspection by any member of the Police Department of the City of Atlanta. It shall be unlawful for any bellboy or house detective to continue in, or to enter upon, said employment, or either of them, in violation of the terms of this section; and it shall furthermore be unlawful for any of them in filing said statement to give a fictitious address. It shall be unlawful for the manager or person in charge of any hotel to fail to keep a book or list showing the name and correct address of said employees or to refuse to exhibit same to any member of the Police Department. The Clerk of Council shall enter, or cause to be entered, in a book prepared by him for that purpose, in alphabetical order, the names of such employees to whom permits are granted under this section, and said Clerk shall keep said statements or records open for inspection by any persons desiring to see same, especially to members of the Police Department. Any bellboy or house detective, or manager, or person in charge of any hotel, who shall violate the provisions hereof, and any employer or his agent aiding or abetting said employee or employees in the violation of this section, shall each be deemed guilty of an offense and on conviction thereof in the Recorder's Court shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or sentenced to work on the public works of the City for not exceeding 30 days, either or both penalties to be inflicted in the discretion of the Recorder. (August 17, 1926).

Cross-reference. - Special permits required for special policemen, see 73-305.

62 MOTOR CARRIERS

121 RACES TO BE SEPARATED IN CABS AND HIRED AUTOMOBILES. - It shall be the duty of all owners and operators of taxicabs or autos for hire within the City of Atlanta to indicate on the sides of such vehicles whether the taxicab or auto for hire is to be used by and shall serve white or negro passengers. The sign so indicating shall be painted under the owner's name and shall be in letters not less than one inch in height. The sign shall read, "For White Passengers Only," or "For Colored Passengers Only," as the case may be. This sign, as well as the "auto for hire" or "taxi" sign, shall be painted on both sides of the vehicle, and in paint that cannot be rubbed or washed off. Such sign shall remain on said car so long as the operator holds a permit and license to operate that machine. No such taxicab or auto for hire owner or operator shall carry both white and negro passengers in the same vehicle, but shall serve one or the other of said races to the exclusion of the other. There shall be white drivers for carrying white passengers and colored drivers for carrying colored passengers. Applicants in filing their petitions for permits shall state on their applications whether the taxicab or auto for hire is to be used for hauling white or colored passengers. (May 7, 1940).

122 PENALTIES. - Any person violating any of the provisions of this Article shall, at the option of the Mayor and General Council, have his permit or license, or both, revoked and shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $200 for each offense and imprisoned not less than 30 nor more than 60 days, or both, within the discretion of the Recorder. (April 20, 1939; May 7, 1940).

201 DEFINITIONS. - A motor bus, as the term is used in this Article, is any motor vehicle operated over the streets and public places of the city for the purpose of carrying passengers for hire, which vehicle receives and discharges passengers along the route traversed. The term includes vehicles called jitneys or jitney busses. It does not include street or interurban railway cars, hotel busses, taxicabs or other motor vehicles rented from fixed stands in streets or from public or private garages, whose destination is under the direction of passengers transported therein, or motor vehicles operated over the streets from points without the city to fixed terminal points within the city. A driver, as the term is used in the Article, is a person driving any motor bus as herein defined.

Cross-reference. - Taxicabs, see Article I of this Chapter, 62-101 et seq. Vehicles operating from without the city, see Article 3 of this Chapter, 62-301 et seq. Street cars, see Chapter 85, 85-101 et seq.

213 CAPACITY OF MOTOR BUSSES. - It shall be unlawful to operate, and no permit or license shall be granted for the operation of, any motor bus having a seating capacity of less than 17 passengers.

217 MOTOR BUSSES NOT PERMITTED ON STREET USED BY STREET RAILWAYS. - No license shall be granted or issued for the operation of any motor bus upon any street or public place or part thereof, the proposed route of which shall include in whole or in part any street upon which the tracks of any street railway are laid and street cars are operated, or upon which motor busses are operated by any street car company as a part of its street railway system. And it shall be unlawful to operate such vehicle over such routes.

Cross-reference. - Street railways, see Chapter 85, 85-101 et seq.

218 MOTOR BUSSES NOT PERMITTED ON PARALLEL STREETS WITHIN TWO BLOCKS OF THOSE USED BY STREET RAILWAYS. - No license shall be granted or issued for the operation of any motor bus upon any street or public place or part thereof, the proposed route of which shall include in whole or in part any street for a distance of more than five blocks in its round trip parallel to and within two blocks of any street upon which the tracks of any street railway are laid and street cars are operated, or upon which motor busses are operated by any street car company as a part of its street railway system. And it shall be unlawful to operate such vehicles over such routes.

219 MOTOR BUSSES TO OPERATE ONLY ON ROUTE GRANTED. - It shall be unlawful to operate any motor bus on or over any street or part thereof not included in the permit therefor, and no change, except temporarily for the purpose of avoiding obstructions, shall be made in the route designated in the permit.

224 CHARGES FOR PASSENGERS AND BAGGAGE. - It shall be unlawful for the driver or other person in control of any motor bus to charge or demand a greater fare from each passenger than 10 cents for each trip, or to make any charge or demand any compensation for the transportation of hand baggage of passengers, unless such baggage is of sufficient size to occupy space which otherwise might be occupied by a passenger, or unless such baggage would inconvenience other passengers using said bus or tend to make operation thereof unsafe.

Cross-reference. - Charter authority to prescribe reasonable charges, see 5-315.

226 BUSSES TO BE WELL BUILT, KEPT CLEAN, AND IN REPAIR AND TO BE SUBJECT TO INSPECTION BY SUPERINTENDENT OF GARAGES. - Every motor bus operated under this Article must be well-built, kept in good repair and in clean and sanitary condition and must be capable of safely and comfortably transporting passengers. Every such bus shall, at all times, be subject to inspection by the Superintendent of Garages, and it shall be unlawful for any person to operate any motor bus which has been disapproved by said Superintendent for failure to comply with the requirements of this Article.

Cross-reference. - Superintendent of Garages, see 63-102.

66 OFFENSES AGAINST THE PUBLIC ORDER, PEACE, AND MORALS.

1005 AMATEUR BASEBALL PROHIBITED ON GROUNDS WITHIN TWO BLOCKS OF PLAYGROUND DEVOTED TO OTHER RACE. - It shall be unlawful for any amateur white baseball team to play baseball on any vacant lot or baseball diamond within two blocks of a playground devoted to the Negro race, and it shall also be unlawful for any amateur colored baseball team to play baseball in any vacant lot or baseball diamond within two blocks of a playground devoted to the white race. The playgrounds referred to in this section are the playgrounds set apart by the city surrounding public schools and given over to athletic purposes during the summer. (June 21, 1932).

126 SEPARATION OF RACES IN PARKS. - It shall be unlawful for colored people to frequent any park owned or maintained by the city for the benefit, use, and enjoyment of white persons, excepting so much of Grant Park as is occupied by the zoo, and unlawful for any white person to frequent any park owned or maintained by the city for the use and benefit of colored persons. (June 4, 1940).

Penalties - $100 and costs or imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or both, in the discretion of the Recorder.

73 POLICE DEPARTMENT

121 POLICE MATRONS: OFFICE CREATED, APPOINTMENT, NUMBER, TERM. - The office of Police Matron is hereby created. There shall be three white matrons and three colored matrons, each of whom shall be appointed and shall serve for Civil service laws. (November 20, 1925; January 20, 1933).

Cross-reference. - Matron for female prisoners at stockade, 74-112.

77 RAILROADS

119 PENAL ORDINANCE EXTENDED OVER TRANSPORTATION LINES BEYOND CITY LIMITS. - All the penal ordinances of the City of Atlanta are hereby extended beyond the city limits over the transportation lines and areas referred to and described in section 3-109. All such ordinances shall apply and be enforced in said territory in the same way they apply and are enforced within the boundaries of the city, and any person violating any of them in said territory shall, on conviction thereof by the Recorder, be punished as though the offense had been committed within said boundaries.

85 STREET RAILROADS

138 PASSENGERS TO OBSERVE STATE LAWS RESPECTING SEPARATE SEATING OF RACES. - Passengers on street cars operated in the limits of the City of Atlanta, and in territory outside the city limits which has been incorporated as a part of said city for police purposes, must observe and obey the requirements of the penal laws of the State as to the separate seating of the races in such cars; and any passenger failing to obey the directions of the conductor or person in charge of the car in this respect, in so far as it is practicable to do so, shall be guilty of an offense and punishable as hereinafter provided.

Cross-reference. - Extension of police jurisdiction over street car lines beyond city limits - Chapter 3, 109 (15).

3-109 (15) Jurisdiction Over Railways Leading Into City. The limits of the City of Atlanta for police purposes only are extended over the different lines of transportation, steam and electric, passenger and freight, leading into said city, either on public roads or private rights of way, for the full extent of the several lines, without the limits of said city, up to and ending at the county line of Fulton County, except where said lines pass through other and different municipal corporations, in which event said corporations shall retain their police power and, further, except on Peachtree Road where the limits of said city shall be extended beyond the said county line and to the end of the transportation lines aforesaid, except as to railroads, and the police power shall extend not only over said lines, but for a distance of 50 feet outside the track or tracks thereof, both on said road and private rights of way. In case of steam railroads, police power shall extend over same, as above provided for, up to and including what is known as the cantonment. Police power of said city, hereby extended, shall cover the portion of said several lines of transportation, above described, and over the areas thereto, as above set out.

Cross-reference. - Exercise of police power beyond city limits, see 77-119.

139 DUTY OF POLICE TO SEE THAT CONDUCTORS ENFORCE STATE LAWS REQUIRING SEPARATION OF RACES. - It shall be the duty of the police to give special attention to ascertain whether conductors or other employees in charge of street cars and other railroad cars, require passengers in their trains or cars to comply with the provisions of the laws of Georgia respecting separate seating of races in such cars; and in case of the violation of the said laws by conductors or other employees of railroad or street railroad companies, to arrest such persons so violating said laws, and prosecute them in the proper state court for such offenses.

Editorial note. - State law requiring separation of races in railroad cars, see 18-205, 18-210, 18-606, and 18-9901 to 18-9906 of the Code of Georgia of 1933.

142 PENALTIES. - Violation of any provision of this chapter, for which no specific penalty is otherwise provided, shall be punishable by fine not to exceed $100 and costs, or by imprisonment for not more than 30 days, either or both penalties to be inflicted in the discretion of the Recorder.

140 PERSONS WITH OFFENSIVE ODORS NOT ALLOWED ON STREET CARS. - It shall be unlawful for anyone who has on or about his person any disgusting or offensive smell or odor to board or attempt to board any street car in the City of Atlanta for the purpose of becoming a passenger thereon, or for any purpose whatsoever, or to ride upon any such street car, or to remain thereon, when requested to quit said car by the conductor.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY SYSTEM

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT VICE PRESIDENT

Washington, D. C., June 29, 1950

TRANSPORTATION DEPARTMENT CIRCULAR NO. 147.
(Cancelling All Prior Instructions On This Subject.)

SUBJECT: Seating Passengers in Dining Cars.

TO: PASSENGER CONDUCTORS AND DINING CAR STEWARDS.

(1) Passengers seeking dining car service shall be seated at vacant seats in the Diner in the order of their entrance into the Diner. Waiting passengers must not unduly block the aisles of the Dining Car.

(2) The steward shall seat Diners so as to promote efficient service with comfort and satisfaction to the Diners. For example, when practicable parties of two, three or four, will be seated together. When entering singly, women will be seated with women, men with men, young people with young people, elderly persons with elderly persons, white persons with white persons, and Negroes with Negroes. In following the above illustrations, Stewards will bear in mind (occupied space permitting), white passengers should be seated from the Buffet or Kitchen end of the Dining car and Negroes from the opposite end. (From the ends toward the Middle). No passenger seeking Dining car service during the meal hour shall be refused such service when there is a vacant seat in the Diner.

(3) It is the immediate duty of the Dining car steward to seat passengers in the Diner and under the General Jurisdiction of the Passenger Conductor to maintain good order among the passengers and afford prompt service to them.

(4) THESE RULES BECOME EFFECTIVE JULY 1, 1950.

R.K. McCLAIN,

ASSISTANT VICE PRESIDENT.

General Appropriations Act of Georgia, 1951
No. 278 (House Bill No. 263)
(Passed at the 1951 session of the legislature. For fiscal year July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952 and each year thereafter until repealed or modified.)

Education

Section 8 (Including grants to aid the common schools)

"...Provided, however, that the State Board of Education shall not be authorized or empowered to apportion any funds herein to any school system that does not provide separate schools for t he white and colored races, as required by the provisions of Article VIII, Section I, Paragraph I of the Constitution of the State of Georgia, and so operate and maintain all schools within its jurisdiction. After said apportionment is approved, any and all obligations and commitments made which are violative of the foregoing provision or in excess of the funds apportioned shall be null and void. ... Provided, further, that should any such system violate the foregoing provisions of this paragraph after said appropriation has been made and approved, then and in such event the unexpended portion of the apportionment to such system shall cease to be available and the State Board of Education shall in writing notify the state budget authority of the cancellation of the allotment previously approved.

"Provided further, that should any part or portion of this section be held unconstitutional by a final judgement of any court of competent jurisdiction, then this entire section shall thereafter be void, invalid and unenforceable, and the remaining balance of the funds appropriated in this section in whole or in part shall not be paid. ..."

Section 9 (Including appropriations for the state university)

"...Provided that the State Board of Regents shall within the first thirty days of each fiscal period determine which of its various units located in Georgia are being operated in compliance with Article VIII, Section I, Paragraph I, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia, providing for separate schools for the white and colored races and shall enter the names of such units so complying upon its records. Thereafter it shall make an apportionment of the various complying units of the university system from all funds available, including the above appropriations, and immediately report the same to the state budget authorities for approval, whose approval shall be evidenced in writing.

Section 9, con't

"Provided, however, that if after the State Board of Regents has with the approval of the budget authorities apportioned available funds to any unit of the university system located in Georgia, such unit ceases to be operated as a separate school for either the white or the colored race, as required by Article VIII, Section I, Paragraph I of the Constitution of the State of Georgia, then and in such event the unexpended portion of the apportionment to such unit shall cease to be available and the State Board of Regents shall in writing notify the state budget authorities of the cancellation of the allotment previously approved.

"Any and all obligations and commitments made which are not approved on budget, which are in excess of the funds apportioned, inclusive of the units' other income, or are made to non-complying units, shall be null and void ...

"Provided further, that should any part or portion of this section be held unconstitutional by a final judgement of any court of competent jurisdiction, then this entire section shall thereafter be void, invalid and unenforceable, and the remaining balance of the funds appropriated in this section in whole or in part shall not be paid."

In Law Enforcement

LAWS RELATING TO SEGREGATION IN EFFECT IN ATLANTA

Definition of Negro and White (State law)

Persons of color, who are - All Negroes, mulattoes, mestizos and their descentants, having any ascertainable trace of either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in their veins, and all descentants of any person having either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in his or her veins shall be known in this State as persons of color. (Acts 1865-6; 1927)

"White person" defined - The term "white person" shall include only persons of the white or Caucasian race, who have no ascertainable trace of either Negro, African, West Indian, Asiatic Indian, Mongolian, Japanese, or Chinese blood in their veins. No person, any of whose ancestors has been duly registered with the State Bureau of Vital Statistics as a colored person or person of color, shall be deemed to be a white person. (Acts 1927)

BARBER SHOPS - (City ordinance)

Barber shops must show on sign whether white or colored persons are served. Penalty for violation - Fine not exceeding $100. or imprisonment up to 30 days.

No colored barber shall serve white women or white girls. Penalty, fine not exceeding $200. or sentence to work on public works up to 30 days. (Feb. 1926)

BILLIARD AND POOLROOMS - (State law)

No person of the white race shall be licensed to operate a billiard room to be used or frequented by persons of the Negro race, nor shall any person of the Negro race be licensed to operate a billiard room to be used by persons of the white race. (Acts 1925)

CEMETERIES - (City ordinance)

Burial of colored persons on grounds set apart for white persons is prohibited.

EDUCATION - (State laws)

The Constitution of Georgia provides that separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored races.

It shall be the duty of the board of education to make arrangements for the instruction of the children of the white and colored races in separate schools. They shall, as far as practicable, provide the same facilities for both races in respect to attainments and abilities of teachers but white and colored children shall not be taught together in any common or public school, and no teacher receiving or teaching white and colored pupils in the same school shall be allowed any compensation out of the common school fund.

The 1951 and 1953 State Appropriations Bills provide that the State Board of Education and the State Board of Regents are not authorized to apportion funds to any school system allowing persons of the white and colored races to be taught in the same school: provided further that should any system violate the above provisions, the expended portion of its appropriation shall be cut off; provided further that should any part of this section be held unconstitutional, then this entire section shall be invalid and unenforceable and the remaining balance of funds appropriated shall not be paid.

In providing tax exemptions for endowed institutions of charity, worship and learning open to the general public, the constitution requires that all endowments to institutions established for white people shall be limited to white people, and all endowments to institutions established for colored people shall be limited to colored people. (Constitution of Ga.)

HOSPITALS -(State law)
Milledgeville State Hospital for Mental Patients shall be divided into separate and distinct apartments so that in no case shall Negroes and white persons be together.

SUMMARIES OF

LEGAL ASPECTS OF "SEPARATE-BUT-EQUAL" EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH

I

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

1. Alabama: "No child of either race shall be permitted to attend a school of the other race."

2. Arkansas: "All persons in the State between the ages of six and twenty-one years may receive gratuitous instruction."

3. Florida: Impartial provision shall be made for both white and colored children in different schools.

4. Georgia: Education shall be as nearly uniform as practicable in separate schools provided for white and colored races.

5. Kentucky: Each race to share fund equally. No distinction shall be made in the separate schools on account of race or color.

6. Louisiana: "Separate free public schools shall be maintained for the education of white and colored children between the ages of six and eighteen years."

7. Mississippi: "Separate schools shall be maintained for children of the white and colored races."

8. North Carolina: "The children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools; but there shall be no discrimination in favor of, or to the prejudice of, either race."

9. Oklahoma: Separate schools for white and colored children, with like accommodations, shall be provided and impartially maintained.

10. South Carolina: "No child of either race shall ever be permitted to attend a school provided for children of the other race."

11. Tennessee: No school shall allow white and Negro children to be received as scholars together in the same school.

12. Texas: "Separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored children, and impartial provision shall be made for both."

13. Virginia: "White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school."

In addition to the thirteen States listed above, which are usually called the Southern Region, there are four other States - Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, and West Virginia - in which Negro and white students are required by law to attend separate schools. In all of these seventeen States equal educational opportunities in the public schools are supposedly guaranteed to all citizens.

II

U. S. SUPREME COURT CASES

Public education on a "separate and equal" basis for Negroes and whites in States maintaining separate facilities for the races is one of the many "race issues" to come to the attention of the United States Supreme Court. One of the most important cases - Cumming vs. County Board of Education - arose in Richmond County, Georgia, when the County School Board discontinued a Negro high school on the ground that there were not sufficient funds to support both an elementary and a high school. The Supreme Court decision in this case, in 1889, upheld the right of the school board to manage its own affairs and, presumably, the right to maintain separate schools for the white and Negro races.

Seven years later the case of Plessy vs. Ferguson went to the Supreme Court from Louisiana. Although Plessy vs. Ferguson was a railroad case in which the Supreme Court upheld the right of the State to require separation of the races in railway travel, it served to emphasize the trend of judicial decisions in favor of States' rights. In the decision on this case, reference was made to Cumming vs. County Board of Education on the assumption that the latter case had established a precedent on the right of the States to maintain separate facilities.

The case of Gong Lum vs. Rice involved the right of the State of Mississippi to exclude a Chinese child from a white public school under a Mississippi constitutional provision requiring separate schools for white and "colored" children. The Supreme Court, in 1927, upheld the right of the State to exclude the Chinese child from the white schools.

Another significant case involved the right of a State to require separation of the races in colleges. A Kentucky statute made it unlawful "for any person, corporation or association of persons to maintain or operate any college, school, or institution where persons of the white and Negro races are both received as pupils for instruction." Berea College, which had since its origin in 1855 admitted both Negro and white students, was indicted, convicted, and fined $1000 under this statute. This case was appealed to the Supreme Court, and its decision, in 1908, upheld the constitutionality of the State law.

The most important recent case involving higher education is that of Gaines vs. Canada, Registrar, Etc. Lloyd Gaines, a Negro, wanted training in law and he sought admission to the Law School of the University of Missouri on the ground that the State did not maintain a law school for Negroes. When he was denied admission he sought a writ of mandamus to require his admission. This case, which originated in 1935, eventually reached the United States Supreme Court. The court's decision (1938) held that if a State separates the races in its schools it is obligated to provide for Negro students, within its borders, the same educational opportunities that it provides for white students.

It is clear that the United States Supreme Court, in its majority opinions, has been inclined to impute all management of schools to the States. Even Justice Harlan, who consistently demonstrated a liberal attitude upon constitutional questions involving the rights of Negroes, did not dissent in the historic case of Cumming vs. County Board of Education. He said in part: "While all admit that the benefits and burdens of public taxation must be shared by citizens without discrimination against any class on account of their race, the education of people in schools maintained by state taxation is a matter belonging to the respective states, and any interference on the part of Federal authority with the management of such schools cannot be justified except in the case of a clear and unmistakable disregard of the rights secured by the supreme law of the land."

Some authorities hold that the direct issue of the right of a State to require separation of the races in public schools has never been met squarely by the Supreme Court. Whether this is true or not, it is certain that the whole question of "separate and equal" educational facilities is going to be one of the live legal issues in the Southern States during the present generation.

III

GRADUATE AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING FOR NEGROES.

The famous Gaines case mentioned above turned the spotlight on the unequal opportunities of Negro students for graduate and professional training in the South. The Supreme Court held in this case (1938) that a State which separates the races in its schools is obligated to offer to Negro students whatever courses it offers to white students.

One result of the Gaines case has been the establishment of certain graduate and professional courses in most of the State colleges for Negroes in the Southern States. None of these courses goes beyond the master's degree. The courses are largely in the fields of education and social science, with a scattering of offerings in other fields. A few so-called law schools have been set up, but they have been of such a make-shift nature that few students have cared to enroll. A recent Texas case, in which a Negro sought admission to the School of Law of the University of Texas, has resulted in a movement in the State Legislature looking toward the establishment of a "real university" for Negroes. Similar cases may be anticipated in other Southern States.

A second result of the Gaines case has been the subsidizing of Negro students who wish to attend certain private Negro institutions in the South. Georgia, for example, assists Negro residents who want to pursue graduate courses available at Atlanta University; and Virginia has entered into an agreement with Meharry Medical College of Nashville, Tennessee, to train Virginia Negro students who want medical training.

A third arrangement growing out of the Gaines case is the system of subsidies for out-of-state graduate and professional training of Negro students. Under this arrangement, which is used by nearly all of the Southern States at present, a Negro student attends an accredited graduate or professional school in the North or West and receives financial assistance from his State. The amount of this assistance differs a great deal from State to State, but in general it is based upon the difference between what he would pay for tuition in his home State and what he has to pay in the school outside the region which he attends. While this arrangement obviously provides better training for many Negro students than they can hope to get in their home States, it is extra-legal in the sense that it does not fullfil the judicial decision in the Gaines case - namely, that equal facilities should be provided within each State.

The whole question of equality of opportunity in higher education is one which is going to demand more and more attention in the near future. Southern States may expect a series of test cases designed to force them to make separate facilities equal in fact or admit Negro students to the existing universities and professional schools.

Among the servants who worked on a distant part of the plantation, was a young man named Abram Williams. Sally was now thirteen years old, and her mistress decided that she should be married, and that the young man should be her husband. Both were her property, therefore the only part they had to play was to acquiesce in the arrangement. It happened very well in this case, but the same power could have been employed, had they disliked each other. What think you of a system which gives such unlimited control, not only over the time and labor of men and women, but over their most sacred affections? Sally had never seen him and knew nothing about the matter, till one day, when she was in the house, her mistress said—

"Well, Sally, you 're thirteen years old, and I want you to be married. There 's a young man over on the plantation who 'll make you a good husband. He 'll come here soon, and you 'll see him," and then followed an enumeration of his good qualities.

"Laws, Missis!" was the only reply Sally could make. After that she missed no opportunity to speak of him to the simple-hearted girl, till Sally said, "'Pears like I loved him 'fore ever I saw him." True to her word, the mistress sent for him. They were pleased with each other, as she had predicted, and as there was no reason for delaying their union, it was agreed that they should be married as soon as the hurry of the planting time was over. He was a kind, good-hearted man, and Sally was happier than she had been for a long time, in feeling that she had some one to love who would love her.

One pleasant Saturday afternoon, a few weeks after this, was fixed upon for the wedding. Work was closed early, so that the servants might participate in the festivities. Sally's scanty wardrobe had been growing less in her careful mother's absence, and now she had no decent dress for the occasion. Her mistress produced from her own stores an old white muslin frock, and added to it a bright ribbon for her waist, and a gauze handkerchief to tie around her head. Abram was equally destitute, and his coarse field dress was exchanged for the time for some cast off clothes of his master's, which made him look, so Sally thought, quite like a gentleman. As a special mark of favor, the ceremony was to be performed in the house. The hour came, and with their bridemaid and groomsman they stood up before the colored Methodist preacher who was in waiting. He opened the Bible and read the account of the marriage at Cana. Sally had never heard it before, and the thought that Jesus had been present at an earthly wedding, impressed her, more than anything had ever done, with the importance of what she was about to do. No one had ever taught her the sacredness of the marriage tie. She had heard it jested about, and had seen it lightly broken, and so it was to her rather an incident of life than one of its solemnities. But now an awe crept over her; she felt as if God were there, and resolved, in heart, to do all in her power for her new-found friend. The reading was followed by a prayer, and then they were pronounced husband and wife. There was a momentary hush in the room. All seemed touched by the services save the master, who had condescended to grace them with his presence, and stood leaning in the door-way, with a satirical smile upon his face. What were to him the words, "whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder?" Did he not know that if for any reason he wished to raise a sum of money, he should separate them, and sell them, with as little feeling as he would a horse or a bushel of rice? No wonder he smiled and thought it folly! The mistress rose, and going up to the young couple, wished them much of happiness and prosperity. She was followed by all the servants in their turn, and when the congratulations were over, she led the way to the open air, where a table was set upon the lawn. It was ornamented with a handsome cake, which she herself had made, and adorned with flowers. Sally, as lady of the day, was made to sit down and pour coffee for the company. When the repast was ended, the lawn was quickly cleared for a dance, in which the mistress insisted that the newly married pair should take the lead. Sally had never danced since the camp-meeting, but they all insisted that she would not be properly married unless she did so, and she was forced to comply. "Dat was de last time I danced," said she, in relating it; "'pears like 't want right, noway."

It was a gay party, and as evening came on, Sally's light-heartedness returned, and she after the month of June, and was not again out on the plantation before the following October; when he one day came out on a little Indian pony that he had used as his hackney, before he was so far reduced as to decline the practice of riding. I suffered very much this summer for want of good and substantial provisions, my master being no longer able to supply me, with his usual liberality, from his own meat house. I was obliged to lay out nearly all my other earnings, in the course of the summer, for bacon, to enable me to bear the hardship and toil to which I was exposed. My master often sent for me to come to the house, and talked to me in a very kind manner; and I believe that no hired overseer could have carried on the business more industriously than I did, until the crop was secured the next winter.

Soon after my master was in the field, in October, he sent for me to come to him one day, and gave me, on parting, a pretty good great coat of strong drab cloth, almost new, which he said would be of service to me in the coming winter. He also gave me at the same time a pair of boots which he had worn half out, but the legs of which were quite good. This great coat and these boots were afterwards of great service to me.

As the winter came on my master grew worse, and though he still continued to walk about the house in good weather, it was manifest that he was approaching the close of his earthly existence. I worked very hard this winter. The crop of cotton was heavy, and we did not get it all out of the field until some time after Christmas, which compelled me to work hard myself, and cause my fellow-slaves to work hard too, in clearing the land that my master was bound to clear every year on this place. He desired me to get as much of the land cleared in time for cotton as I could, and to plant the rest with corn when cleared off.

As I was now entrusted with the entire superintendence of the plantation by my master, who never left his house, it became necessary for me to assume the authority of an overseer of my fellow-slaves, and I not unfrequently found it proper to punish them with stripes to compel them to perform their work. At first I felt much repugnance against the use of the hickory, the only instrument with which I punished offenders, but the longer I was accustomed to this practice, the more familiar and less offensive it became to me; and I believe that a few years of perseverance and experience would have made me as inveterate a negro-driver as any in Georgia, though I feel conscious that I never should have become so hardened as to strip a person for the purpose of whipping, nor should I ever have consented to compel people to work with-that they were of Scotch descent. There were four children, Emma, Willie, Johnnie and Jimmie. All looked at me, and thought I was "a spry little fellow." I was very shy and did not say much, as everything was strange to me. I was put to sleep that night on a pallet on the floor in the dining room, using an old quilt as a covering. The next morning was Christmas, and it seemed to be a custom to have egg-nog before breakfast. The process of making this was new and interesting to me. I saw them whip the whites of eggs, on a platter, to a stiff froth; the yolks were thoroughly beaten in a large bowl, sugar and plenty of good brandy were added, and the whites of the eggs and cream were then stirred in, a little nutmeg grated on top of each glass when filled for serving. This was a delicious drink, and the best of all was, there was plenty of it. I served this to all the family, and, as there were also visiting relatives present, many glasses were required, and I found the tray so heavy I could hardly carry it. I helped myself, after the service was finished, and I was delighted, for I had never tasted anything so fine before.

My boss told me I was to wait on the madam, do any errand necessary, attend to the dining room—in fact I was installed as general utility boy. It was different from the quiet manner of life I had seen before coming here—it kept my spirits up for some time. I thought of my mother often, but I was gradually growing to the idea that it was useless to cry, and I tried hard to overcome my feelings.

PLANTATION LIFE.

As already stated, it was Christmas morning, and, after breakfast, I saw the cook hurrying, and when I went out into the yard, everywhere I looked slaves met my view. I never saw so many slaves at one time before. In Virginia we did not have such large farms. There were no extensive cotton plantations, as in Mississippi. I shall never forget the dinner that day—it was a feast fit for a king, so varied and lavish was the bill of fare. The next attraction for me was the farm hands getting their Christmas rations. Each was given a pint of flour of which they made biscuit, which were called "Billy Seldom," because biscuit were very rare with them. Their daily food was corn bread, which they called "Johnny Constant," as they had it constantly. In addition to the flour each received a piece of bacon or fat meat, from which they got the shortening for their biscuit.

living. I was known no longer as errand boy, but installed as butler and body-servant to my master. I had the same routine of morning work, only it was more extensive. There was a great deal to be done in so spacious a mansion. Looking after the parlors, halls and dining rooms, arranging flowers in the rooms, waiting on the table, and going after the mail was my regular morning work, the year round. Then there were my duties to perform, night and morning, for my master; these were to brush his clothes, black his shoes, assist him to arrange his toilet, and do any little thing that he wanted me to. Aside from these regular duties, there were windows to wash, silver to polish and steps to stone on certain days in the week. I was called to do any errand neccessary, and sometimes to assist in the garden. A new staff of house servants was installed, as follows: Aunt Delia, cook; Louisa, chambermaid; Puss, lady's maid to wait on the madam; Celia, nurse; Lethia, wet nurse; Sarah, dairy maid; Julia, laundress; Uncle Gooden, gardener; Thomas, coachman.

THE NEW STYLE OF LIVING.

The servants, at first, were dazed with the splendor of the new house, and laughed and chuckled to themselves a good deal about mars' fine house, and really seemed pleased; for, strange to say, the slaves of rich people always rejoiced in that fact. A servant owned by a man in moderate circumstances was hooted at by rich men's slaves. It was common for them to say: "Oh! don't mind that darkey, he belongs to po'r white trash." So, as I said, our slaves rejoiced in master's good luck. Each of the women servants wore a new, gay colored turban, which was tied differently from that of the ordinary servant, in some fancy knot. Their frocks and aprons were new, and really the servants themselves looked new. My outfit was a new cloth suit, and my aprons for wearing when waiting on the table were of snowy white linen, the style being copied from that of the New York waiters. I felt big, for I never knew what a white bosom shirt was before; and even though the grief at the separation from my dear mother was almost unbearable at times, and my sense of loneliness in having no relative near me often made me sad, there was consolation, if not compensation, in this little change. I had known no comforts, and had been so cowed and broken in spirits, by cruel lashings, that I really felt light-hearted at this improvement in my were indebted to her for many more important services.

Such were the unusually fortunate circumstances of my early childhood. When I was six years old, my mother died; and then, for the first time, I learned, by the talk around me, that I was a slave. My mother's mistress was the daughter of my grandmother's mistress. She was the foster sister of my mother; they were both nourished at my grandmother's breast. In fact, my mother had been weaned at three months old, that the babe of the mistress might obtain sufficient food. They played together as children; and, when they became women, my mother was a most faithful servant to her whiter foster sister. On her death-bed her mistress promised that her children should never suffer for any thing; and during her lifetime she kept her word. They all spoke kindly of my dead mother, who had been a slave merely in name, but in nature was noble and womanly. I grieved for her, and my young mind was troubled with the thought who would now take care of me and my little brother. I was told that my home was now to be with her mistress; and I found it a happy one. No toilsome or disagreeable duties were imposed upon me. My mistress was so kind to me that I was always glad to do her bidding, and proud to labor for her as much as my young years would permit. I would sit by her side for hours, sewing diligently, with a heart as free from care as that of any free-born white child. When she thought I was tired, she would send me out to run and jump; and away I bounded, to gather berries or flowers to decorate her room. Those were happy days — too happy to last. The slave child had no thought for the morrow; but there came that blight, which too surely waits on every human being born to be a chattel.

When I was nearly twelve years old, my kind mistress sickened and died. As I saw the cheek grow paler, and the eye more glassy, how earnestly I prayed in my heart that she might live! I loved her; for she had been almost like a mother to me. My prayers were not answered. She died, and they buried her in the little churchyard, where, day after day, my tears fell upon her grave.

I was sent to spend a week with my grandmother. I was now old enough to begin to think of the future; and again and again I asked myself what they would do with me. I felt sure I should never find another mistress so kind as the one who was gone. She had promised my dying mother that her children should never suffer for any thing; and when I remembered that, and recalled her many proofs of attachment to me, I could not help having some hopes that she had left me free. My friends were almost certain it would be so. They thought she would be sure to do it, on account of my mother's love and faithful service. But, alas! we all know that the memory of a faithful slave does not avail much to save her children from the auction block.

After a brief period of suspense, the will of my mistress was read, and we learned that she had bequeathed me to her sister's daughter, a child of five years old. So vanished our hopes. My mistress had taught me the precepts of God's Word: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." But I was her slave, and I suppose she did not recognize me as her neighbor. I would give much to blot out from my memory that one great wrong. As a child, I loved my mistress; and, looking back on the happy days I spent with her, I try to think with less bitterness of this act of injustice. While I was with her, she taught me to read and spell; and for this privilege, which so rarely falls to the lot of a slave, I bless her memory.

She possessed but few slaves; and at her death those were all distributed among her relatives. Five of them were my grandmother's children, and had shared the same milk that nourished her mother's children. Notwithstanding my grandmother's long and faithful service to her owners, not one of her children escaped the auction block. These God-breathing machines are no more, in the sight of their masters, than the cotton they plant, or the horses they tend.

II.

THE NEW MASTER AND MISTRESS.

Dr. Flint, a physician in the neighborhood, had married the sister of my mistress, and I was now the property of their little daughter. It was not without murmuring that I prepared for my new home; and what added to my unhappiness, was the fact that my brother William was purchased by the same family. My father, by his nature, as well as by the habit of transacting business as a skilful mechanic, had more of the feelings of a freeman than is common among slaves. My brother was a spirited boy; and being brought up under such influences, he early detested the name of master and mistress. One day, when his father and his mistress both happened to call him at the same time, he hesitated between the two; being perplexed to know which had the strongest claim upon his obedience. He finally concluded to go to his mistress. When my father reproved him for it, he said, "You both called me, and I didn't know which I ought to go to first."

"You are my child," replied our father, "and when I call you, you should come immediately, if you have to pass through fire and water."

Poor Willie! He was now to learn his first lesson of obedience to a master. Grandmother tried to cheer us with hopeful words, and they found an echo in the credulous hearts of youth.

When we entered our new home we encountered

V.

THE TRIALS OF GIRLHOOD.

During the first years of my service in Dr. Flint's family, I was accustomed to share some indulgences with the children of my mistress. Though this seemed to me no more than right, I was grateful for it, and tried to merit the kindness by the faithful discharge of my duties. But I now entered on my fifteenth year — a sad epoch in the life of a slave girl. My master began to whisper foul words in my ear. Young as I was, I could not remain ignorant of their import. I tried to treat them with indifference or contempt. The master's age, my extreme youth, and the fear that his conduct would be reported to my grandmother, made him bear this treatment for many months. He was a crafty man, and resorted to many means to accomplish his purposes. Sometimes he had stormy, terrific ways, that made his victims tremble; sometimes he assumed a gentleness that he thought must surely subdue. Of the two, I preferred his stormy moods, although they left me trembling. He tried his utmost to corrupt the pure principles my grandmother had instilled. He peopled my young mind with unclean images, such as only a vile monster could think of. I turned from him with disgust and hatred. But he was my master. I was compelled to live under the same roof with him — where I saw a man forty years my senior daily violating the most sacred commandments of nature. He told me I was his property; that I must be subject to his will in all things. My soul revolted against the mean tyranny. But where could I turn for protection? No matter whether the slave girl be as black as ebony or as fair as her mistress. In either case, there is no shadow of law to protect her from insult, from violence, or even from death; all these are inflicted by fiends who bear the shape of men. The mistress, who ought to protect the helpless victim, has no other feelings towards her but those of jealousy and rage. The degradation, the wrongs, the vices, that grow out of slavery, are more than I can describe. They are greater than you would willingly believe. Surely, if you credited one half the truths that are told you concerning the helpless millions suffering in this cruel bondage, you at the north would not help to tighten the yoke. You surely would refuse to do for the master, on your own soil, the mean and cruel work which trained bloodhounds and the lowest class of whites do for him at the south.

Every where the years bring to all enough of sin and sorrow; but in slavery the very dawn of life is darkened by these shadows. Even the little child, who is accustomed to wait on her mistress and her children, will learn, before she is twelve years old, why it is that her mistress hates such and such a one among the slaves. Perhaps the child's own mother is among those hated ones. She listens to violent outbreaks of jealous passion, and cannot help understanding what is the cause. She will become prematurely knowing in evil things. Soon she will learn to tremble when she hears her master's footfall. She will be compelled to realize that she is no longer a child. If God has bestowed beauty upon her, it will prove her greatest curse. That which commands admiration in the white woman only hastens the degradation of the female slave. I know that some are too much brutalized by slavery to feel the humiliation of their position; but many slaves feel it most acutely, and shrink from the memory of it. I cannot tell how much I suffered in the presence of these wrongs, nor how I am still pained by the retrospect. My master met me at every turn, reminding me that I belonged to him, and swearing by heaven and earth that he would compel me to submit to him. If I went out for a breath of fresh air, after a day of unwearied toil, his footsteps dogged me. If I knelt by my mother's grave, his dark shadow fell on me even there. The light heart which nature had given me became heavy with sad forebodings. The other slaves in my master's house noticed the change. Many of them pitied me; but none dared to ask the cause. They had no need to inquire. They knew too well the guilty practices under that roof; and they were aware that to speak of them was an offence that never went unpunished.

I longed for some one to confide in. I would have given the world to have laid my head on my grandmother's faithful bosom, and told her all my troubles. But Dr. Flint swore he would kill me, if I was not as silent as the grave. Then, although my grandmother was all in all to me, I feared her as well as loved her. I had been accustomed to look up to her with a respect bordering upon awe. I was very young, and felt shamefaced about telling her such impure things, especially as I knew her to be very strict on such subjects. Moreover, she was a woman of a high spirit. She was usually very quiet in her demeanor; but if her indignation was once roused, it was not very easily quelled. I had been told that she once chased a white gentleman with a loaded pistol, because he insulted one of her daughters. I dreaded the consequences of a violent outbreak; and both pride and fear kept me silent. But though I did not confide in my grandmother, and even evaded her vigilant watchfulness and inquiry, her presence in the neighborhood was some protection to me. Though she had been a slave, Dr. Flint was afraid of her. He dreaded her scorching rebukes. Moreover, she was known and patronized by many people; and he did not wish to have his villany made public. It was lucky for me that I did not live on a distant plantation, but in a town not so large that the inhabitants were ignorant of each other's affairs. Bad as are the laws and customs in a slaveholding community, the doctor, as a professional man, deemed it prudent to keep up some outward show of decency.

O, what days and nights of fear and sorrow that man caused me! Reader, it is not to awaken sympathy for myself that I am telling you truthfully what I suffered in slavery. I do it to kindle a flame of compassion in your hearts for my sisters who are still in bondage, suffering as I once suffered.

I once saw two beautiful children playing together. One was a fair white child; the other was her slave, and also her sister. When I saw them embracing each other, and heard their joyous laughter, I turned sadly away from the lovely sight. I foresaw the inevitable blight that would fall on the little slave's heart. I knew how soon her laughter would be changed to sighs. The fair child grew up to be a still fairer woman. From childhood to womanhood her pathway was blooming with flowers, and overarched by a sunny sky. Scarcely one day of her life had been clouded when the sun rose on her happy bridal morning.

How had those years dealt with her slave sister, the little playmate of her childhood? She, also, was very beautiful; but the flowers and sunshine of love were not for her. She drank the cup of sin, and shame, and misery, whereof her persecuted race are compelled to drink.

In view of these things, why are ye silent, ye free men and women of the north? Why do your tongues falter in maintenance of the right? Would that I had more ability! But my heart is so full, and my pen is so weak! There are noble men and women who plead for us, striving to help those who cannot help themselves. God bless them! God give them strength and courage to go on! God bless those, every where, who are laboring to advance the cause of humanity!

VI.

THE JEALOUS MISTRESS.

I WOULD ten thousand times rather that my children should be the half-starved paupers of Ireland than to be the most pampered among the slaves of America. I would rather drudge out my life on a cotton plantation, till the grave opened to give me rest, than to live with an unprincipled master and a jealous mistress. The felon's home in a penitentiary is preferable. He may repent, and turn from the error of his ways, and so find peace; but it is not so with a favorite slave. She is not allowed to have any pride of character. It is deemed a crime in her to wish to be virtuous.

Mrs. Flint possessed the key to her husband's character before I was born. She might have used this knowledge to counsel and to screen the young and the innocent among her slaves; but for them she had no sympathy. They were the objects of her constant suspicion and malevolence. She watched her husband with unceasing vigilance; but he was well practised in means to evade it. What he could not find opportunity to say in words he manifested in signs. He invented more than were ever thought of in a deaf and dumb asylum. I let them pass, as if I did not understand what he meant; and many were the curses and threats bestowed on me for my stupidity. One day he caught me teaching myself to write. He frowned, as if he was not well pleased; but I suppose he came to the conclusion that such an accomplishment might help to advance his favorite scheme. Before long, notes were often slipped into my hand. I would return them, saying, "I can't read them, sir." "Can't you?" he replied; "then I must read them to you." He always finished the reading by asking, "Do you understand?" Sometimes he would complain of the heat of the tea-room, and order his supper to be placed on a small table in the piazza. He would lean back there with a well satisfied smile, and tell me to fetch a fan and brush away the flies. He would eat very slowly, pausing between the mouthfuls. These intervals were employed in describing the happiness I was so foolishly throwing away, and in threatening me with the penalty that finally invested my rebellion. He had lost much of the fascination he had over myself towards me, and realized that there was a limit to his patience. When I succeeded in avoiding opportunities for him to talk to me at home, I was ordered to come to his office, in the same house. When there, I was told to stand, and then he would language as he saw fit to address to me. Sometimes he so openly expressed his contempt for him that he would become violently enraged, and I wonder why he did not strike me. Perhaps he probably thought it was better policy to be patient. But the state of things grew worse and worse. In desperation I told him that I would rather resort to my grandmother's protection, even at the risk of death, and worse than death, if I made any complaint to her. Strange to say, I did not despair of my grandmother, of a buoyant disposition, and always had a hope of somehow getting out of his clutches. Like many a poor, simple slave before me, I trusted that some threads of joy would yet be woven into my dark destiny.

I had entered my sixteenth year, and every day it became more apparent that my presence was intolerable to Mrs. Flint. Angry words frequently passed between her and my husband. He had never punished me himself, and he would not allow any body else to punish me. In that respect she was never satisfied; and so the angry words grew more and more bitter. She had long been jealous of me, and I whom she detested so strongly had grown very fair in her sight, whose soul was as black as the bottom of the bottomless pit. I never wronged her in word or deed, and one word of kindness would have brought me to her feet.

All the evil passions between the doctor and his wife were now aroused to make his youngest victim feel their power. She was there to take his youngest child, and to deem my boy's worst misfortune should sleep in the same room with the child slumbered. I [illegible] for what [illegible] had been made. He made [illegible] to keep certain right of peoples as much as possible [illegible] had [illegible] succeeded in [illegible] though a reason was given, held to [illegible] change this line of policy. [illegible] the room of my great aunt, where I [illegible] to some new for room. [illegible] had been in the family [illegible] room, and a pro[illegible] necessary to save appearances in some degree. But he resolved to remove the obstacle in the way of his scheme; and he thought he had planned it so that he should evade suspicion. He was well aware how much I prized my refuge by the side of my old aunt, and he determined to dispossess me of it. The first night the doctor had the little child in his room alone. The next morning, I was ordered to take my station as nurse the following night. A kind Providence interposed in my favor. During the day Mrs. Flint heard of this new arrangement, and a storm followed. I rejoiced to hear it rage.

After a while my mistress sent for me to come to her room. Her first question was, "Did you know you were to sleep in the doctor's room?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Who told you?"

"My master."

"Will you answer truly all the questions I ask?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Tell me, then, as you hope to be forgiven, did you consent of what I have accused you?"

"I am."

She handed me a Bible, and said, "Lay your hand on your heart, kiss this holy book, and swear before God that you will tell me the truth."

I took the oath she required, and I did it with a clear conscience.

"You have taken God's holy word to testify your innocence," said she. "If you have deceived me, be aware." Now take this scroll, sit down, look me steadily in the face, and tell me all that has passed between your master and you."

I did as she ordered. As I went on with my account her color changed frequently, she wept, and sometimes groaned. She spoke in tones so sad, that I was touched by her grief. The tears came to my eyes; but I was soon convinced that her emotions arose from anger and wounded pride. She felt that her marriage vows were desecrated, her dignity insulted; but she had no compassion for the poor victim of her husband's perfidy. She pitied herself as a martyr; but she was incapable of feeling for the condition of shame and misery in which her unfortunate, helpless slave was placed.

Yet perhaps she had some touch of feeling for me; for when the conference was ended, she spoke kindly, and promised to protect me. I should have been much comforted by this assurance if I could have had confidence in it; but my experiences in slavery had filled me with distrust. She was not a very refined woman, and had not much control over her passions. I was an object of her jealousy, and, consequently, of her hatred; and I knew I could not expect kindness or confidence from her under the circumstances in which I was placed. I could not blame her. Slaveholders' wives feel as other women would under similar circumstances. The fire of her temper kindled from small sparks, and now the flame became so intense that the doctor was obliged to give up his intended arrangement.

I knew I had ignited the torch, and I expected to suffer for it afterwards; but I felt too thankful to my mistress for the timely aid she rendered me to care much about that. She now took me to sleep in a room adjoining her own. There I was an object of her especial care, though not of her especial comfort, for she spent many a sleepless night to watch over me. Sometimes I woke up, and found her bending over me. At other times she whispered in my ear, as though it was her husband who was speaking to me, and listened to hear what I would answer. If she startled me, on such occasions, she would glide stealthily away; and the next morning she would tell me I had been talking in my sleep, and ask who I was talking to. At last, I began to be fearful for my life. It had been often threatened; and you can imagine, better than I can describe, what an unpleasant sensation it must produce to wake up in the dead of night and find a jealous woman bending over you. Terrible as this experience was, I had fears that it would give place to one more terrible.

My mistress grew weary of her vigils; they did not prove satisfactory. She changed her tactics. She now tried the trick of accusing my master of crime, in my presence, and gave my name as the author of the accusation. To my utter astonishment, he replied, "I don't believe it; but if she did acknowledge it, you tortured her into exposing me." Tortured into exposing him! Truly, Satan had no difficulty in distinguishing the color of his soul! I understood his object in making this false representation. It was to show me that I gained nothing by seeking the protection of my mistress; that the power was still all in his own hands. I pitied Mrs. Flint. She was a second wife, many years the junior of her husband; and the hoary-headed [illegible] was enough to try the patience of a wiser and better woman. She was completely foiled, and knew not how to proceed. She would gladly have had me flogged for my supposed false oath; but, as I have already stated, the doctor never allowed any one to whip me. The old sinner was politic. The application of the lash might have led to remarks that would have exposed him in the eyes of his children and grandchildren. How often did I rejoice that I lived in a town where all the inhabitants knew each other! If I had been on a remote plantation, or lost among the multitude of a crowded city, I should not be a living woman at this day.

The secrets of slavery are concealed like those of the Inquisition. My master was, to my knowledge, the father of eleven slaves. But did the mothers dare to tell who was the father of their children? Did the other slaves dare to allude to it, except in whispers among themselves? No, indeed! They knew too well the terrible consequences.

My grandmother could not avoid seeing things which excited her suspicions. She was uneasy about me, and tried various ways to buy me; but the never-changing answer was always repeated: "Linda does not belong to me. She is my daughter's property, and I have no legal right to sell her." The conscientious man! He was too scrupulous to sell me; but he had no scruples whatever about committing a much greater wrong against the helpless young girl placed under his guardianship, as his daughter's property. Sometimes my persecutor would ask me whether I would like to be sold. I told him I would rather be sold to any body than to lead such a life as I did. On such occasions he would assume the air of a very injured individual, and reproach me for my ingratitude. "Did I not take you into the house, and make you the companion of my own children?" he would say. "Have I ever treated you like a negro? I have never allowed you to be punished, not even to please your mistress. And this is the recompense I get, you ungrateful girl!" I answered that he had reasons of his own for screening me from punishment, and that the course he pursued made my mistress hate me and persecute me. If I wept, he would say, "Poor child! Don't cry! don't cry! I will make peace for you with your mistress. Only let me arrange matters in my own way. Poor, foolish girl! you don't know what is for your own good. I would cherish you. I would make a lady of you. Now go, and think of all I have promised you."

I did think of it.

Reader, I draw no imaginary pictures of southern homes. I am telling you the plain truth. Yet when victims make their escape from this wild beast of Slavery, northerners consent to act the part of bloodhounds, and hunt the poor fugitive back into his den, "full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness." Nay, more, they are not only willing, but proud, to give their daughters in marriage to slaveholders. The poor girls have romantic notions of a sunny clime, and of the flowering vines that all the year round shade a happy home. To what disappointments are they destined! The young wife soon learns that the husband in whose hands she has placed her happiness pays no regard to his marriage vows. Children of every shade of complexion play with her own fair babies, and too well she knows that they are born unto him of his own household. Jealousy and hatred enter the flowery home, and it is ravaged of its loveliness.

Southern women often marry a man knowing that he is the father of many little slaves. They do not trouble themselves about it. They regard such children as property, as marketable as the pigs on the plantation; and it is seldom that they do not make them aware of this by passing them into the slave-trader's hands as soon as possible, and thus getting them out of their sight. I am glad to say there are some honorable exceptions.

I have myself known two southern wives who exhorted their husbands to free those slaves towards whom they stood in a "parental relation;" and their request was granted. These husbands blushed before the superior nobleness of their wives' natures. Though they had only counselled them to do that which it was their duty to do, it commanded their respect, and rendered their conduct more exemplary. Concealment was at an end, and confidence took the place of distrust.

Though this bad institution deadens the moral sense, even in white women, to a fearful extent, it is not altogether extinct. I have heard southern ladies say of Mr. Such a one, "He not only thinks it no disgrace to be the father of those little niggers, but he is not ashamed to call himself their master. I declare, such things ought not to be tolerated in any decent society!"

This love-dream had been my support through many trials; and I could not bear to run the risk of having it suddenly dissipated. There was a lady in the neighborhood, a particular friend of Dr. Flint's, who often visited the house. I had a great respect for her, and she had always manifested a friendly interest in me. Grandmother thought she would have great influence with the doctor. I went to this lady, and told her my story. I told her I was aware that my lover's being a free-born man would prove a great objection; but he wanted to buy me; and if Dr. Flint would consent to that arrangement, I felt sure he would be willing to pay any reasonable price. She knew that Mrs. Flint disliked me; therefore, I ventured to suggest that perhaps my mistress would approve of my being sold, as that would rid her of me. The lady listened with kindly sympathy, and promised to do her utmost to promote my wishes. She had an interview with the doctor, and I believe she pleaded my cause earnestly; but it was all to no purpose.

How I dreaded my master now! Every minute I expected to be summoned to his presence; but the day passed, and I heard nothing from him. The next morning, a message was brought to me: "Master wants you in his study." I found the door ajar, and I stood a moment gazing at the hateful man who claimed a right to rule me, body and soul. I entered, and tried to appear calm. I did not want him to know how my heart was bleeding. He looked fixedly at me, with an expression which seemed to say, "I [illegible] half a mind to kill you on the spot." At last he broke the silence, and that was a relief to both of us.

"So you want to be married, do you?" said he, "and to a free nigger."

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I'll soon convince you whether I am your master, or the nigger fellow you honor so highly. If you must have a husband, you may take up with one of my slaves."

What a situation I should be in, as the wife of one of his slaves, even if my heart had been interested!

I replied, "Don't you suppose, sir, that a slave can have some preference about marrying? Do you suppose that all men are alike to her?"

"Do you love this nigger?" said he, abruptly.

"Yes, sir."

"How dare you tell me so!" he exclaimed, in great wrath. After a slight pause, he added, "I supposed you thought more of yourself; that you felt above the insults of such puppies."

"I replied, "If he is a puppy I am a puppy, for we are both of the negro race. It is right and honorable for us to love each other. The man you call a puppy never insulted me, sir; and he would not love me if he did not believe me to be a virtuous woman."

He sprang upon me like a tiger, and gave me a stunning blow. It was the first time he had ever struck me; and fear did not enable me to control my anger. When I had recovered a little from the effects, I exclaimed, "You have struck me for answering you honestly. How I despise you!"

There was silence for some minutes. Perhaps he was deciding what should be my punishment; or, perhaps, he wanted to give me time to reflect on what I had said, and to whom I had said it. Finally, he asked, "Do you know what you have said?"

"Yes, sir; but your treatment drove me to it."

"Do you know that I have a right to do as I like with you,—that I can kill you, if I please?"

"You have tried to kill me, and I wish you had; but you have no right to do as you like with me."

"Silence!" he exclaimed, in a thundering voice. "By heavens, girl, you forget yourself too far! Are you mad? If you are, I will soon bring you to your senses. Do you think any other master would bear what I have borne from you this morning? Many masters would have killed you on the spot. How would you like to be sent to jail for your insolence?"

"I know I have been disrespectful, sir," I replied; "but you drove me to it; I couldn't help it. As for the jail, there would be more peace for me there than there is here."

"You deserve to go there," said he, "and to be under such treatment, that you would forget the meaning of the word peace. It would do you good. It would take some of your high notions out of you. But I am not ready to send you there yet, notwithstanding your ingratitude for all my kindness and forbearance. You have been the plague of my life. I have wanted to make you happy, and I have been repaid with the basest ingratitude; but though you have proved yourself incapable of appreciating my kindness, I will be lenient towards you, Linda. I will give you one more chance to redeem your character. If you behave yourself and do as I require, I will forgive you and treat you as I always have done; but if you disobey me, I will punish you as I would the meanest slave on my plantation. Never let me hear that fellow's name mentioned again. If I ever know of your speaking to him, I will cowhide you both; and if I catch him lurking about my premises, I will shoot him as soon as I would a dog. Do you hear what I say? I'll teach you a lesson about marriage and free niggers! Now go, and let this be the last time I have occasion to speak to you on this subject."

Reader, did you ever hate? I hope not. I never did but once; and I trust I never shall again. Somebody has called it "the atmosphere of hell;" and I believe it is so.

For a fortnight the doctor did not speak to me. He thought to mortify me; to make me feel that I had disgraced myself by receiving the honorable addresses of a respectable colored man, in preference to the base proposals of a white man. But though his lips disdained to address me, his eyes were very loquacious. No animal ever watched its prey more narrowly than he watched me. He knew that I could write, though he had failed to make me read his letters; and he was now troubled lest I should exchange letters with another man. After a while he became weary of silence; and I was sorry for it. One morning, as he passed through the hall, to leave the house, he contrived to thrust a note into my hand. I thought I had better read it, and spare myself the vexation of having him read it to me. It expressed regret for the blow he had given me, and reminded me that I myself was wholly to blame for it. He hoped I had become convinced of the injury I was doing myself by incurring his displeasure. He wrote that he had made up his mind to go to Louisiana; that he should take several slaves with him, and intended I should be one of the number. My mistress would remain where she was; therefore I should have nothing to fear from that quarter. If I merited kindness from him, he assured me that it would be lavishly bestowed. He begged me to think over the matter, and answer the following day.

The next morning I was called to carry a pair of scissors to his room. I laid them on the table, with the letter beside them. He thought it was my answer, and did not call me back. I went as usual to attend my young mistress to and from school. He met me in the street, and ordered me to stop at his office on my way back. When I entered, he showed me his letter, and asked me why I had not answered it. I replied, "I am your daughter's property, and it is in your power to send me, or take me, wherever you please." He said he was very glad to find me so willing to go, and that we should start early in the autumn. He had a large practice in the town, and I rather thought he had made up the story merely to frighten me. However that might be, I was determined that I would never go to Louisiana with him.

Summer passed away, and early in the autumn Dr. Flint's eldest son was sent to Louisiana to examine the country, with a view to emigrating. That news did not disturb me. I knew very well that I should not be sent with him. That I had not been taken to the plantation before this time, was owing to the fact that his son was there. He was jealous of his son; and jealousy of the overseer had kept him from punishing me by sending me into the fields to work. Is it strange that I was not proud of these protectors? As for the overseer, he was a man for whom I had less respect than I had for a bloodhound.

Young Mr. Flint did not bring back a favorable report of Louisiana, and I heard no more of that scheme. Soon after this, my lover met me at the corner of the street, and I stopped to speak to him. Looking up, I saw my master watching us from his window. I hurried home, trembling with fear. I was sent for, immediately, to go to his room. He met me with a blow. "When is mistress to be married?" said he, in a sneering tone. A shower of oaths and imprecations followed. How thankful I was that my lover was a free man! that my tyrant had no power to flog him for speaking to me in the street!

Again and again I revolved in my mind how all this would end. There was no hope that the doctor would consent to sell me on any terms. He had an iron will, and was determined to keep me, and to conquer me. My lover was an intelligent and religious man. Even if he could have obtained permission to marry me while I was a slave, the marriage would give him no power to protect me from my master. It would have made him miserable to witness the insults I should have been subjected to. And then, if we had children, I knew they must "follow the condition of the mother." What a terrible blight that would be on the heart of a free, intelligent father! For his sake, I felt that I ought not to link his fate with my own unhappy destiny. He was going to Savannah to see about a little property left him by an uncle; and

it. I was too ill in mind and body to enjoy my friends as I had done. For some weeks I was unable to leave my bed. I could not have any doctor but my master, and I would not have him sent for. At last, alarmed by my increasing illness, they sent for him. I was very weak and nervous; and as soon as he entered the room, I began to scream. They told him my state was very critical. He had no wish to hasten me out of the world, and he withdrew.

When my babe was born, they said it was premature. It weighed only four pounds; but God let it live. I heard the doctor say I could not survive till morning. I had often prayed for death; but now I did not want to die, unless my child could die too. Many weeks passed before I was able to leave my bed. I was a mere wreck of my former self. For a year there was scarcely a day when I was free from chills and fever. My babe also was sickly. His little limbs were often racked with pain. Dr. Flint continued his visits, to look after my health; and he did not fail to remind me that my child was an addition to his stock of slaves.

I felt too feeble to dispute with him, and listened to his remarks in silence. His visits were less frequent; but his busy spirit could not remain quiet. He employed my brother in his office, and he was made the medium of frequent notes and messages to me. William was a bright lad, and of much use to the doctor. He had learned to put up medicines, to leech, cup, and blood. He had taught himself to read and spell. I was proud of my brother; and the old doctor suspected as much. One day, when I had not seen him for several weeks, I heard his steps approaching the door. I dreaded the encounter, and hid myself. He inquired for me, of course; but I was nowhere to be found. He went to his office, and despatched William with a note. The color mounted to my brother's face when he gave it to me; and he said, "Don't you hate me, Linda, for bringing you these things?" I told him I could not blame him; he was a slave, and obliged to obey his master's will. The note ordered me to come to his office. I went. He demanded to know where I was when he called. I told him I was at home. He flew into a passion, and said he knew better. Then he launched out upon his usual themes, — my crimes against him, and my ingratitude for his forbearance. The laws were laid down to me anew, and I was dismissed. I felt humiliated that my brother should stand by, and listen to such language as would be addressed only to a slave. Poor boy! He was powerless to defend me; but I saw the tears, which he vainly strove to keep back. This manifestation of feeling irritated the doctor. William could do nothing to please him. One morning he did not arrive at the office so early as usual; and that circumstance afforded his master an opportunity to vent his spleen. He was put in jail. The next day my brother sent a trader to the doctor, with a request to be sold. His master was greatly incensed at what he called his insolence. He said he had put him there to reflect upon his bad conduct, and he certainly was not giving any evidence of repentance. For two days he harassed himself to find somebody to do his office work; but every thing went wrong without William. He was released, and ordered to take his old stand, with many threats, if he was not careful about his future behavior.

As the months passed on, my boy improved in health. When he was a year old, they called him beautiful. The little vine was taking deep root in my existence, though its clinging fondness excited a mixture of love and pain. When I was most sorely oppressed I found a solace in his smiles. I loved to watch his infant slumbers; but always there was a dark cloud over my enjoyment. I could never forget that he was a slave. Sometimes I wished that he might die in infancy. God tried me. My darling became very ill. The bright eyes grew dull, and the little feet and hands were so icy cold that I thought death had already touched them. I had prayed for his death, but never so earnestly as I now prayed for his life; and my prayer was heard. Alas, what mockery it is for a slave mother to try to pray back her dying child to life! Death is better than slavery. It was a sad thought that I had no name to give my child. His father caressed him and treated him kindly, whenever he had a chance to see him. He was not unwilling that he should bear his name; but he had no legal claim to it; and if I had bestowed it upon him, my master would have regarded it as a new crime, a new piece of insolence, and would, perhaps, revenge it on the boy. O, the serpent of Slavery has many and poisonous fangs!

FEAR OF INSURRECTION.

Not far from this time Nat Turner's insurrection broke out; and the news threw our town into great commotion. Strange that they should be alarmed, when their slaves were so "contented and happy"! But so it was.

It was always the custom to have a muster every year. On that occasion every white man shouldered his musket. The citizens and the so-called country gentlemen wore military uniforms. The poor whites took their places in the ranks in every-day dress, some without shoes, some without hats. This grand occasion had already passed; and when the slaves were told there was to be another muster, they were surprised and rejoiced. Poor creatures! They thought it was going to be a holiday. I was informed of the true state of affairs, and imparted it to the few I could trust. Most gladly would I have proclaimed it to every slave; but I dared not. All could not be relied on. Mighty is the power of the torturing lash.

By sunrise, people were pouring in from every quarter within twenty miles of the town. I knew the houses were to be searched; and I expected it would be done by country bullies and the poor whites. I knew nothing annoyed them so much as to see colored people living in comfort and respectability; so I made arrangements for them with especial care. I arranged hymns; and they do not trouble their heads much about the measure. They often sing the following verses:

"Old Satan is one busy ole man;
He rolls dem blocks all in my way;
But Jesus is my bosom friend;
He rolls dem blocks away.

"If I had died when I was young,
Den how my stam'ring tongue would have sung;
But I am ole, and now I stand
A narrow chance for to tread dat heavenly land."

I well remember one occasion when I attended a Methodist class meeting. I went with a burdened spirit, and happened to sit next a poor, bereaved mother, whose heart was still heavier than mine. The class leader was the town constable — a man who bought and sold slaves, who whipped his brethren and sisters of the church at the public whipping post, in jail or out of jail. He was ready to perform that Christian office any where for fifty cents. This white-faced, black-hearted brother came near us, and said to the stricken woman, "Sister, can't you tell us how the Lord deals with your soul? Do you love him as you did formerly?"

She rose to her feet, and said, in piteous tones, "My Lord and Master, help me! My load is more than I can bear. God has hid himself from me, and I am left in darkness and misery." Then, striking her breast, she continued, "I can't tell you what is in here! They've got all my children. Last week they took the last one. God only knows where they've sold her. They let me have her sixteen years, and then —— O! O! Pray for her brothers and sisters!

I've got nothing to live for now. God make my time short!"

She sat down, quivering in every limb. I saw that constable class leader become crimson in the face with suppressed laughter, while he held up his handkerchief, that those who were weeping for the poor woman's calamity might not see his merriment. Then, with assumed gravity, he said to the bereaved mother, "Sister, pray to the Lord that every dispensation of his divine will may be sanctified to the good of your poor needy soul!"

The congregation struck up a hymn, and sung as though they were as free as the birds that warbled round us, —

"Ole Satan thought he had a mighty aim;
He missed my soul, and caught my sins.
Cry Amen, cry Amen, cry Amen to God!

"He took my sins upon his back;
Went muttering and grumbling down to hell.
Cry Amen, cry Amen, cry Amen to God!

"Ole Satan's church is here below.
Up to God's free church I hope to go.
Cry Amen, cry Amen, cry Amen to God!"

Precious are such moments to the poor slaves. If you were to hear them at such times, you might think they were happy. But can that hour of singing and shouting sustain them through the dreary week, toiling without wages, under constant dread of the lash?

The Episcopal clergyman, who, ever since my earliest recollection, had been a sort of god among the slaveholders, concluded, as his family was large, that he must go where money was more abundant. A cunning enough to enact that "the child shall follow the condition of the mother," not of the father; thus taking care that licentiousness shall not interfere with avarice. This reflection made me clasp my innocent babe all the more firmly to my heart. Horrid visions passed through my mind when I thought of his liability to fall into the slave trader's hands. I wept over him, and said, "O my child! perhaps they will leave you in some cold cabin to die, and then throw you into a hole, as if you were a dog."

When Dr. Flint learned that I was again to be a mother, he was exasperated beyond measure. He rushed from the house, and returned with a pair of shears. I had a fine head of hair; and he often railed about my pride of arranging it nicely. He cut every hair close to my head, storming and swearing all the time. I replied to some of his abuse, and he struck me. Some months before, he had pitched me down stairs in a fit of passion; and the injury I received was so serious that I was unable to turn myself in bed for many days. He then said, "Linda, I swear by God I will never raise my hand against you again;" but I knew that he would forget his promise.

After he discovered my situation, he was like a restless spirit from the pit. He came every day; and I was subjected to such insults as no pen can describe. I would not describe them if I could; they were too low, too revolting. I tried to keep them from my grandmother's knowledge as much as I could. I knew she had enough to sadden her life, without having my troubles to bear. When she saw the doctor treat me with violence, and heard him utter oaths terrible enough to palsy a man's tongue, she could not always hold her peace. It was natural and motherlike that she should try to defend me; but it only made matters worse.

When they told me my new-born babe was a girl, my heart was heavier than it had ever been before. Slavery is terrible for men; but it is far more terrible for women. Superadded to the burden common to all, they have wrongs, and sufferings, and mortifications peculiarly their own.

Dr. Flint had sworn that he would make me suffer, to my last day, for this new crime against him, as he called it; and as long as he had me in his power he kept his word. On the fourth day after the birth of my babe, he entered my room suddenly, and commanded me to rise and bring my baby to him. The nurse who took care of me had gone out of the room to prepare some nourishment, and I was alone. There was no alternative. I rose, took up my babe, and crossed the room to where he sat. "Now stand there," said he, "till I tell you to go back!" My child bore a strong resemblance to her father, and to the deceased Mrs. Sands, her grandmother. He noticed this; and while I stood before him, trembling with weakness, he heaped upon me and my little one every vile epithet he could think of. Even the grandmother in her grave did not escape his curses. In the midst of his vituperations I fainted at his feet. This recalled him to his senses. He took the baby from my arms, laid it on the bed, dashed cold water in my face, took me up, and shook me violently, to restore my consciousness before any one entered the room. Just then my grandmother came in, and he hurried out of the house. I suffered in consequence of this treatment; but I begged my friends to let me die, rather than send for the doctor. There was nothing I dreaded so much as his presence. My life was spared; and I was glad for the sake of my little ones. Had it not been for these ties to life, I should have been glad to be released by death, though I had lived only nineteen years.

Always it gave me a pang that my children had no lawful claim to a name. Their father offered his; but, if I had wished to accept the offer, I dared not while my master lived. Moreover, I knew it would not be accepted at their baptism. A Christian name they were at least entitled to; and we resolved to call my boy for our dear good Benjamin, who had gone far away from us.

My grandmother belonged to the church; and she was very desirous of having the children christened. I knew Dr. Flint would forbid it, and I did not venture to attempt it. But chance favored me. He was called to visit a patient out of town, and was obliged to be absent during Sunday. "Now is the time," said my grandmother; "we will take the children to church, and have them christened."

When I entered the church, recollections of my mother came over me, and I felt subdued in spirit. There she had presented me for baptism, without any reason to feel ashamed. She had been married, and had such legal rights as slavery allows to a slave. The vows had at least been sacred to her, and she had never violated them. I was glad she was not alive, to know under what different circumstances her grandchildren were presented for baptism. Why had my lot been so different from my mother's? Her master had died when she was a child; and she remained with her mistress till she married. She was never in the power of any master; and thus she escaped one class of the evils that generally fall upon slaves.

When my baby was about to be christened, the former mistress of my father stepped up to me, and proposed to give it her Christian name. To this I added the surname of my father, who had himself no legal right to it; for my grandfather on the paternal side was a white gentleman. What tangled skeins are the genealogies of slavery! I loved my father; but it mortified me to be obliged to bestow his name on my children.

When we left the church, my father's old mistress invited me to go home with her. She clasped a gold chain round my baby's neck. I thanked her for this kindness; but I did not like the emblem. I wanted no chain to be fastened on my daughter, not even if its links were of gold. How earnestly I prayed that she might never feel the weight of slavery's chain, whose iron entereth into the soul!

[illegible] On Monday, in court week, I went to him; he was playing at billiards, and would not go with me, but told me to come again the next day; the next day he did the same, and so on daily. I went to his sister, Mrs. Grice, and told her I feared that he did not mean to give them to me; she said she feared so too, and sent for him. He was a very wicked young man; he came, and cursed her, and went out of the house. Mr. Grice was from home; on his return, he went to my master, and told him he ought to give me my free papers; that I had paid for myself, and it was court week, so that there was no excuse. He promised he would; instead of which, he rode away, and kept away till court was over. Before the next court came, he sold me to Mr. Trewitt for $600.

The way in which Mr. Trewitt came to buy me was this: I had left the boats, and had gone with a schooner collecting lumber in Albemarle Sound for the merchants. Coming to Elizabeth City, I found a new store had been opened by Mr. Grice, which Mr. Sutton was keeping: the latter gentleman was glad to see me, and was desirous that I should return to my old employment with the canal boats, as lumber was in great demand at Norfolk. I did so, and sold some cargoes to Mr. Moses Myers, of Norfolk. As I was waiting at the door of his store for settlement, he came up with Mr. Trewitt, whom I did not then know. Mr. Myers said to Mr. Trewitt, 'Here is a captain doing business for you.' Mr. Trewitt then asked me who had chartered the boats, and to whom I belonged. I told him Mr. Sutton had chartered me, and that I had belonged to Mr. James Grandy, but had bought myself. He said he would buy me; on which Mr.

Myers told him he would not, [illegible] bought myself, and further said I was [illegible] old war captains, and had never lost a single [illegible] of the property intrusted to me. Mr. Trewitt said he would buy me, and would see about it as soon as he got to Elizabeth City. I thought no more about it. On my return voyage, I delivered a cargo at Elizabeth City, for Mr. Trewitt. I had been at Mr. Grice's, the owner of the boats; and, on my going away from him to meet Mr. Trewitt for settlement, he said he would go with me, as he wanted money. Opposite the custom house we met Mr. Trewitt, who said, 'Well, captain, I have bought you.' Mr. Grice said, 'Let us have no nonsense; go and settle with him.' Angry words passed between them, one saying he had bought me, and the other denying that he had or could, as I had bought myself already. We all went to Mr. Grice's dwelling house; there Mr. Trewitt settled with me about the freight, and then, jumping up, said, 'Now I will show you, Mr. Grice, whether I am a liar or not.' He fetched the bill of sale; on reading it, Mr. Grice's color changed, and he sent for Mrs. Grice. When she read it, she began to cry; seeing that, I began to cry too. She sent me to her brother, who was at Mr. Wood's boarding house. He was playing at billiards. I said to him, 'Master James, have you sold me?' He said, 'No.' I said he had; when he turned round and went into another room, crying; I followed him. All the gentlemen followed us, saying, 'Captain Grandy, what is the matter?' I told them Master James had sold me again. They asked him why he had done it; he said it was because people had jeered him by saying I had more sense than he [illegible] They would not suffer him to remain in the boarding house, but turned him out, there and then, with all his trunks and boxes. Mrs. Grice, his sister, sued him in my name for my liberty, but he gained the cause. The court maintained that I, and all I could do, belonged to him, and that he had a right to do as he pleased with me and all my earnings, as his own property, until he had taken me to the court house, and given me my free papers, and until, besides that, I had been a year and a day in the Northern States to gain my residence.

So I was forced to go to Mr. Trewitt. He agreed that, if I would pay him the same wages as I paid my late master, and the $600 he gave for me, he would give me my free papers. He bought two canal boats, and, taking me out of Mr. Grice's employment, set me to work them on the same terms as I did for my former master. I was two years and a half in earning $600 to pay for myself the second time. Just when I had completed the payment, he failed. On Christmas eve he gave me a letter to take to Mr. Mews, at Newbegun Creek. I was rather unwilling to take it, wishing to go to my wife; I told him, too, I was going to his office to settle with him. He offered to give me two dollars to take the letter, and said he would settle when I came back: then Mr. Shaw came from another room, and said his vessel was ready loaded, but he had nobody he could trust with his goods; he offered me five dollars to take the vessel down, and deliver the goods to Mr. Knox, who also was at Newbegun Creek. The wind was fair, and the hands on board, so I agreed; it being Christmas eve, I was glad of something to carry to my wife. I ran the vessel down to the mouth of the creek, [illegible] and [illegible] when the moon rose, I went [illegible] river. I reached the wharf, and commenced [illegible] out the goods that night, and delivered them all safely to Mr. Knox next morning. I then took the letter to Mr. Mews, who read it, and, looking up at me, said, 'Well, you belong to me.' I thought he was joking, and said, 'How? What way?' He said, 'Don't you recollect when Trewitt chartered Wilson Sawyer's brig to the West Indies?' I said, I did. He told me Trewitt then came to him to borrow $600, which he would not lend, except he had a mortgage on me: Trewitt was to take it up at a certain time, but never did. I asked him whether he really took the mortgage on me. He replied that he certainly thought Trewitt would have taken up the mortgage, but he had failed, and was not worth a cent, and he, Mews, must have his money. I asked him whether he had not helped me and my young mistress in the court house, when master James fooled me before. He said he did help me all he could, and that he should not have taken a mortgage on me, but that he thought Trewitt would take it up. Trewitt must have received some of the last payments from me, after he had given the mortgage, and knew he should fail; for the mortgage was given two months before this time.

My head seemed to turn round and round; I was quite out of my senses; I went away towards the woods; Mr. Mews sent his waiter after me to persuade me to go back. At first I refused, but afterwards went. He told me he would give me another chance to buy myself, and I certainly should have my freedom that time. He said Mr. Enoch Sawyer wanted to buy me, to be his overseer in the

YOUTH.

[illegible] of [illegible] years of age my master died, and [illegible] were driven to the market, but I was kept on the [illegible] valued at 900 dollars. About this time a wager was [illegible] I could fetch a bucket of water from a spring in a given [illegible] appeared they had a good opinion of my activity and ability [illegible] this task, but I had not sufficient time allowed me to do it in. I did all I could to accomplish it, knowing that I should be [illegible] if my oppressor lost his wager, but I failed; he was greatly [illegible], and getting a switch from the hedge, laid it on my bare back till the blood ran down to my heels, and for this slight offence almost took my life—at least I thought so. About a year after my whipping my father (being, I think, about forty years of age,) came into the field in harvest time, and thinking the slaves had not worked hard enough, called for a "cradle"—a thing used for cutting corn—and took the lead; the slaves kept so well up with him that they almost got the head of him; but he was determined not to be beaten, so kept going at a furious rate till he was quite exhausted. He was almost immediately taken ill, as was supposed from over exertion, and died the next day, about four o'clock. I believe this was year 1836.

I have mentioned the death of my old master, Mr. Abraham Ensor, who died about this time, between 70 and 80 years of age. His son, Mr. Luke Ensor, succeeded to the estate, and not only took me at a valuation, but also my mother, with the rest of the children; a circumstance which pleased us much, as we dreaded to be separated—for we poor slaves, with all our degradations, have strong natural affections. Our new master was what is called a moderate one, though at times violent in his temper, and tyrannical in his conduct, but not more so than his abominable slave holding propensities would make him; he gave us plenty of work, and did not overfeed us, our food being Indian corn, red herrings, cabbage, and always something very cheap; you may be sure when we could catch anything better we were no way particular about taking it. I remember on one occasion we found about a dozen eggs, and were resolved to have a feast; so we took them to our quarters, and placed them in the ashes to roast. Whilst they were cooking, Mr. Ensor came to enquire about some business; being Sabbath day we were dreadfully afraid, thinking he had come to look after the eggs, and were all but scared to death lest he should discover them in our possession, when lo! as he stood at the door, a [illegible] with a frightful noise, scattering the ashes in all directions, [illegible] where Mrs. Ensor stood. He immediately [illegible] the matter. We all declared we did not know [illegible] not satisfy him, so he came forward, and with his [illegible] in the ashes, where he found some which had not [illegible] demanded who brought them there, and I along with three others was obliged to confess. We all got a severe caning on the spot, with a promise that for the next offence we should be tied up and shot [illegible]

A circumstance which proves the violence of Mr. Ensor's temper occurs to me. I was sent out to harrow in a large field of corn, and had got pretty well on with my work, when my master rode up on horseback, and, unfortunately for me, in that state sometimes called "three sheets in the wind." He called me to him and complained that my work was badly done. I durst not answer, so he followed up his complaint by laying his cane about my head and shoulders; he then took the butt end of his whip and struck me some violent blows on my forehead, which felled me to the ground, bleeding most dreadfully. I was in an unconscious state for some time; my master got alarmed, and thought he had killed me. Having dismounted from his horse, and called some slaves, he bade them remove me under the shade of a large tree; he then commanded them to rub me, in order to bring me round again. I was then carried to the kitchen at the "big house," where I was cared for by Mrs. Ensor, who quite believed her husband had beaten the senses out of me, and scolded him severely for having done so. I remained in this state for some time, and, though badly hurt, was not so bad as I pretended, for I wished him to think that my senses were gone, in order to get a little sympathy from him and others —an ingredient which poor slaves do not often meet with. Though still keeping up the deception, I was set shelling corn, Mrs. Ensor frequently blaming my master for having "driven poor Sam crazy." However he came into the kitchen one day, evidently to try me, and called out "Sam, Sam, come here and saddle and bridle my horse." I looked up at him very stupidly, and followed him very slowly to the stable. I then took down the bridle, and moving gently to the horse's tail, began to lift up the bridle in that direction, when he cried out, "you black ghost don't you know the horse's head from its tail?" and taking it from me, put it on himself, and rode off. I returned to the kitchen, where Mrs. Ensor continued her care of me, plying me well with calomel and jalap, until I was completely tired out, and resumed my occupation again. This affair had a very salutary effect on Mr. Ensor, who never ventured to beat his slaves on their heads again.

[illegible] were to show the degrading character [illegible] on the moral as well as the physical [illegible] slavery. [illegible] a slave, and got on for a length of time [illegible] do in my situation, but, from the frequent [illegible] and ill treatment which I received, as well as witnessed, I [illegible] a longing desire for freedom. I felt as though I had [illegible] in being born black, and wished that I could by any [illegible] change my skin into a white one, feeling certain that I should [illegible] free. Seeing my poor mother frequently shedding tears, I used [illegible] to press her to tell me why she did so, and would often say, "Mother, why do you weep?" "Oh!" she would say, "I am sick at heart to think that I am a poor wretched slave for life, and you and your brothers and sisters are in the same condition." I, of course, sympathised very deeply with my poor mother, particularly as at this time two sisters and a brother of mine were sold by Mr. Ensor; also a cousin, a girl nearly white, and a daughter of my Aunt Comfort. This was a sore trial to my poor mother and aunt, and I thought they would never see through their grief at parting with their children, which proved to be for ever, as they never saw them more. I shall never forget going down to Baltimore to take a last farewell of my relatives. I had to intercede with Mr. Ensor for a length of time before he would consent to let me go on such an errand. At last, after ridiculing the idea of black people having any feelings, he consented, and to Baltimore I went, along with my poor mother. We found our relatives in a large prison, in Pratt-street, together with eight or nine hundred other slaves, who belonged to two slave dealers named Slater and Woodfork, who had bought them for the southern market, and although they do all they can to keep up the spirits of the poor wretches, by supplying them with plenty of whisky and amusements of various kinds, yet the grief and anguish that prevailed amongst them is beyond description. My mother and I were only allowed about half an hour to take leave of those whom we were about to lose for ever. I shall never forget the parting as long as I live; I really thought it would have killed my mother, and have no doubt that her health and spirits then received such a shock as she will never recover from.

These separations made me sigh for freedom with an intensity of feeling such as I had hitherto been a stranger to, and I resolved on making an attempt to escape the very first opportunity that should present itself. I set about obtaining every information in my power on the subject, and for that purpose frequently made stolen visits to some limekilns, about two or three miles from our quarters, ostensibly to give Gee one a chance at their work, but really to hear something about freedom. I didn't long to hear the poor fellows on their supper, my office being always paid in the evening, where I frequently remained till three o'clock in the morning. I often met persons there who would say something encouraging to me as my mind longed. I well remember meeting with two Irishmen at this place, who listened to my tale of woe with manifest feelings of interest; they told me there was a country where I should be free if I could get there; but I could not conceive where this country could be, or how I was to get to it, nor, in fact, how I was keep myself anywhere, for Mr. Enoch had always tried to make us believe that we could not take care of ourselves if we had the liberty, so that my poor mind was in such a dark state that I was far off being in a condition to seek for freedom in right good earnest.

Oh! when I heard of this sweet land,
  Where Freedom bravely thrives,
And sure protection guards each class,
  And treasures human lives,
Oh! then like flashing lightning, quick
  Came HOPE unto my mind;
Why! should not I like others strive
  That blessed land to find?

CHAPTER III.

MANHOOD.

And now, behold me a man! strong, active, energetic, but not owned by myself! the chattel of a man like myself, who dared, in the sight of High Heaven, to deprive me of my birthright—the right to act, and think, and speak--behold me! body, soul, and spirit, valued at 900 dollars, and a slave!—but to my narrative.

My master seemed to gain confidence in me, and being as he called "a fine young man," and a "valuable slave," he made me into his market-man, and frequently sent me to Baltimore market, with a wagon and two horses, laden with the produce of the plantation. The distance was about 20 or 30 miles, which took us a long day to travel. We generally arrived there in the evening, and put up at the Bull's Head, kept by Mr. George Manley. When we got there in good time we had an hour or two to spare, previous to going to bed. This time was generally spent in visiting friends with whom we had become acquainted me that she had been a slave all her life, that all my brothers and sisters were slaves, that I had better be satisfied and remain with them; besides she would say, "You will surely be retaken." Poor woman! she could not bear the thought of parting with me: however I resolved to try. This conversation took place on a Friday night, I think in June, 1841.

On that night following I made a start direct north, taking the north star for my guide, having been told that Canada lay in that direction. I travelled through woods and swamps, being afraid to take the high road, even during the night. I had made a little provision for my journey in the shape of corn bread, sufficient to last me probably for three days; fearing to take what would make too large a bundle, which would be sure to create suspicion if met by any on the road. In addition I was armed with a walking stick and an old dirk; though I felt in no humour for fighting, being alarmed at the slightest noise I heard. The first night I walked about fifteen miles, and lay up for the day on John Merryman's, Pine-hill; this was on a Sunday. In the evening I proceeded on my journey, and had, on the third, taken up my lodgings at Deer Creek, in the woods, when I was overtaken by John Nelson and Bill Foster, two negro-catchers, who resided a few miles from Mr. Ensor. These men had a number of bloodhounds with them, who soon scented me out, when I got upon my feet, and had a most desperate struggle with them, but they succeeded in tearing my clothes to rags. They endeavoured to seize me by the throat, and bit me severely on the breast, the marks of which are plainly visible to this day. The fellows now came up and made them loose their hold, at the same time exultingly shouting, "well, Ensor Sam, we've got you at last!" They then handcuffed me, and dragging me along some distance, mounted their horses, while I trudged along on foot, weak, wretched, and miserable, for two whole days. When we arrived at Mr. Ensor's the whole family turned out to upbraid me for my ingratitude, reminding me of Mr. Ensor's great kindness in having paid 950 dollars for me rather than send me to Georgia, which would have been my fate had he not purchased me with the estate; but upbraidings were not all. I must be severely punished; and Eli Stephenson, the overseer, got orders to give me a severe lashing upon my bare back, the effects of which I feel to this day. In addition to this a yoke was made for me to wear on my head. This was a band of iron, to which was affixed two upright pieces hooked to the top, from which were suspended two bells, the whole fitting closely to my head; and this disgraceful badge I wore day and night for three months. So much again for slave-holding tyranny.

My spirits this time seemed so broken and subdued, that life appeared not worth the having. My master often tauntingly asked me how I liked the "yoke;" and, while pretending to pity me, always threatened that if I attempted to escape again, I should wear it for life. About this time two gentlemen came on a visit to Mr. Ensor, and frequently asked me if I would like to be free and go with them to the north; but my constant answer was, "No, I would rather stop with my master and be a slave." I durst not trust them—I had no confidence in them—slavery destroys confidence between man and man. I was conscious that I was uttering falsehoods, and doing what I ought not to do. And let me ask my kind readers who is the party answerable at the judgment seat of God for such wickedness; is it myself, or my cruel persecutors? Oh! I could have told them of big thoughts swelling in my bosom—thoughts of Liberty, Liberty. I felt that slavery was a burden too heavy to be borne. My poor degraded fellow slaves laughed at my sorrows, and exultingly exhibited their freedom in contrast to my disgrace. The neighbouring planters forbade me association with their slaves, lest I should contaminate them. I was shunned and dreaded in the neighbourhood, and treated as an outcast by all around. However, time works wonders, and so it did for me. I began to feel I was again regaining the confidence of those around. I became much attached to a number of slaves on the late Mr. Gorsuch's plantation, which joined Mr. Ensor's, and often went to their quarters in the evening, and remained with them till morning. This came to Mr. Gorsuch's ears, who watched his opportunity for forbidding it. One summer's evening I paid one of my usual visits, and as at that time of the year the slaves slept in the hayloft over the horses, of course I did the same. We were all fast asleep, when about three o'clock in the morning we were all startled by Mr. Gorsuch's voice calling the slaves' names over; he then inquired if there were any stray niggers there? Some said "No;" while others said there was a "darkey" there, meaning a stranger. He soon found me out, and with a thick stick laid on me most unmercifully. I jumped from the loft into the stable, he after me in quick pursuit; I then attempted to scale a boarded fence, but it was too high for me, so I put my head through a hole in the boarding, hoping to drag my poor body after, but whilst struggling there, neither able to get backward or forward, Mr. Gorsuch came up and renewed the attack in the most savage manner: at last the boards gave way. I took to my heels, but my unmerciful punisher was not satisfied; he followed me home, related the affair to Mr. Ensor, who encouraged him to give me a second beating before his face, which he did, leaving her shoulder, to get a better view of me. With a very uneasy feeling I seated myself upon the broken stool, to which Aunt Polly pointed. One of the boldest of the children came up to me, and, slyly touching my dress, said, "tag," then darted off to her hiding-place, with quite the air of a victress. Amy made queer grimaces at me. Every now and then placing her thumb to her nose, and gyrating her finger towards me, she would drawl out, "you ka-n-t kum it." All this was perfect jargon to me; for at home, though we had been but imperfectly protected by clothing from the vicissitudes of seasons, and though our fare was simple, coarse, and frugal, had we been kindly treated, and our manners trained into something like the softness of humanity. There, as regularly as the Sunday dawned, were we summoned to the house to hear the Bible read, and join (though at a respectful distance) with the family in prayer. But this I subsequently learned was an unusual practice in the neighborhood, and was attributed to the fact, that my master's wife had been born in the State of Massachusetts, where the people were crazy and fanatical enough to believe that "niggers" had souls, and were by God held to be responsible beings.

The loud blast of the horn was the signal for the "hands" to suspend their labor and come to breakfast. Two negro men and three women rushed in at the door, ravenous for their rations. I looked about for the table, but, seeing none, concluded it had yet to be arranged; for at home we always took our meals on a table. I was much surprised to see each one here take a slice of fat bacon and a pone of bread in his or her hand, and eat it standing.

"Well," said one man, "I'd like to git a bit more bread."

"You's had your sher," replied Aunt Polly. "Mister Jones ses one slice o' meat and a pone o' bread is to be the 'lowance."

"I knows it, but if thar's any scraps left from the house table, you wimmin folks always gits it."

"Who's got de bes' right? Sure, and arn't de one who cooks it got de bes' right to it?" asked Polly, with a triumphant voice.

"Ha, ha!" cried Nace, "here comes de breakfust leavin's, now who's smartest shall have 'em;" whereupon Nace, his comrade, and the three women, seized a waiter of fragments of biscuit, broiled ham, coffee, &c., the remains of the breakfast prepared for the white family.

"By gar," cried Nace, "I've got de coffee-pot, and I'll drink dis;" so, without further ceremony, he applied the spout to his mouth, and, sans cream or sugar, he quaffed off the grounds. Jake possessed himself of the ham, whilst the two women held a considerable contest over a biscuit. Blow and lie passed frequently between them. Aunt Polly brandished her skimmer-spoon, as though it were Neptune's trident of authority; still she could not allay the confusion which these excited cormorants raised. The children yelled out and clamored for a bit; the sight and scent of ham and biscuits so tantalized their palates, that they forgot even the terror of the whip. I stood all agape, looking on with amazement.

The two belligerent women stood with eyes blazing like comets, their arms twisted around each other in a very decided and furious rencontre. One of them, losing her balance, fell upon the floor, and, dragging the other after her, they rolled and wallowed in a cloud of dust, whilst the disputed biscuit, in the heat of the affray, had been dropped on the hearth, where, unperceived by the combatants, Nace had possessed himself of it, and was happily masticating it.

Melinda, the girl from whom the waiter had been snatched, doubtless much disappointed by the loss of the debris, returned to the house and made a report of the fracas.

Instantly and unexpectedly, Jones, flaming with rage, stood in the midst of the riotous group. Seizing hold of the women, he knocked them on their heads with his clenched fists.

"Hold, black wretches, come, I will give you a leetle fun; off now to the post."

Then such appeals for mercy, promises of amendment, entreaties, excuses, &c., as the two women made, would have touched a heart of stone; but Jones had power to resist even the prayers of an angel. To him the cries of human suffering and the agony of distress were music. My heart bled when I saw the two victims led away, and I put my hands to my ears to shut out the screams of distress which rang with a strange terror on the morning air. Poor, oppressed African! thorny and rugged is your path of life! Many a secret sigh and bleeding tear attest your cruel martyrdom! Surely He, who careth alike for the high and the low, looks not unmoved upon you, wearing and groaning beneath the pressing burden and galling yoke of a most inhuman bondage. For you there is no broad rock of Hope or Peace to cast its shadow of rest in this "weary land." You must sow in tears and reap in sorrow. But He, who led the children of Israel from the house of bondage and the fetters of captivity, will, in His own inscrutable way, lead you from the condition of despair, even by the pillar of fire and the cloud. Great changes are occurring daily, old constitutions are tottering, old systems, fraught with the cruelty of darker ages, are shaking to their centres. Master minds are everywhere actively engaged. Keen eyes and vigilant hearts are open to the wrongs of the poor, the lowly and the outcast. An avenging angel sits concealed 'mid the drapery of the wasting cloud, ready to pour the vials of God's wrath upon a haughty and oppressive race. In the threatened famine, see we nothing but an accidental failure of the crops? In the exhausted coffers and empty public treasury, is there nothing taught but the lesson of national extravagance? In the virulence of disease, the increasing prevalence of fatal epidemics, what do we read? Send for the seers, the wise men of the nation, and bid them translate the "mysterious writing on the wall." Ah, well may ye shake, Kings of Mammon, shake upon your tottering throne of human bones! Give o'er your sports, suspend your orgies, dash down the jewelled cup of unhallowed joy, sparkling as it is to the very brim. You must pay, like him of old, the fearful price of sin. God hath not heard, unmoved, the anguished cries of a down-trodden and enslaved nation! And it needs no Daniel to tell, that "God hath numbered your Kingdom and it is finished."

As may be supposed, I had little appetite for my breakfast, but I managed to deceive others into the belief that I had made a hearty meal. But those screams from half-famished wretches had a fatal and terrifying fascination; never once could I forget it.

A look of fright was on the face of all. "They be gettin' awful beatin' at the post," muttered Nace, whilst a sardonic smile flitted over his hard features. Was it not sad to behold the depths of degradation into which this creature had fallen? He could smile at the anguish of a fellow-creature. Originally, his nature may have been kind and gentle; but a continuous system of brutality had so deadened his sensibilities, that he had no humanity left. For this, the white man is accountable.

After the breakfast was over, I received a summons to the house. Following Melinda, I passed the door-sill, and stood in the presence of the assembled household. A very strange group I thought them. Two girls were seated beside the uncleared breakfast table, "trying their fortune" (as the phrase goes) with a cup of coffee-grounds and a spoon. The elder of the two was a tall, thin girl, with sharp features, small gray eyes, and red-hair done up in frizettes; the other was a prim, dark-skinned girl, with a set of nondescript features, and hair of no particular hue, or "just any color;" but with the same harsh expression of face that characterized the elder. As she received the magic cup from her sister, she exclaimed, "La, Jane, it will only be two years until you are married," and made a significant grimace at her father (Mr. Peterkin), who sat near the window, indulging in the luxury of a cob-pipe. The taller girl turned toward me, and asked,

"Father, is that the new girl you bought at old Nelson's sale?"

"Yes, that's the gal. Does she suit you?"

"Yes, but dear me! how very light she is—almost white! I know she will be impudent."

"She has come to the wrong place for the practice of that article," suggested the other.

CHAPTER IV

CONVERSATION WITH MISS BRADLY—A LIGHT BREAKS THROUGH THE DARKNESS.

I HAD been living with Mr. Peterkin about three years, during which time I had frequently seen Miss Bradly. One evening when she called (as was her custom after the adjournment of school), she found, upon inquiry, that the young ladies had gone out, and would not probably be back for several hours. She looked a little disconcerted, and seemed doubtful whether she would go home or remain. I had often observed her attentively watching me, yet I could not interpret the look; sometimes I thought it was of deep, earnest pity. Then it appeared only an anxious curiosity; and as commiseration was a thing which I seldom met with, I tried to guard my heart against anything like hope or trust; but on this afternoon I was particularly struck by her strange and irresolute manner. She turned several times as if to leave, then suddenly stopped, and, looking very earnestly at me, asked, "Did you say the girls would not return for several hours?"

Upon receiving an answer in the affirmative, she hesitated a moment, and then inquired for Mr. Peterkin. He was also from home, and would probably be absent for a day or two. "Is there no white person about the place?" she asked, with some trepidation.

"No one is here but the slaves," I replied, perhaps in a sorrowful tone, for the word "slave" always grated upon my ear, yet I frequently used it, in obedience to a severe and imperative conventionality.

"Well then, Anna, come and sit down near me; I want to talk with you awhile."

This surprised me a great deal. I scarcely knew what to do. The very idea of sitting down to a conversation with a white lady seemed to me the wildest improbability. A vacant stare was the only answer I could make. Certainly, I did not dream of her being in earnest.

"Come on, Ann," she said, coaxingly; but, seeing that my amazement increased, she added, in a more persuasive tone, "Don't be afraid, I am a friend to the colored race."

This seemed to me the strangest fiction. A white lady, and yet a friend to the colored race! Oh, impossible! such condescension was unheard of! What! she a refined woman, with a snowy complexion, to stoop from her proud elevation to befriend the lowly Ethiopian! Why, she could not, she dare not! Almost stupefied with amazement, I stood, with my eyes intently fixed upon her.

"Come, child," she said, in a kind tone, and placing her hand upon my shoulder, she endeavored to seat me beside her, "look up,—be not ashamed, for I am truly your friend. Your downcast look and melancholy manner have often struck me with sorrow."

To this I could make no reply. Utterance was denied me. My tongue clove to the roof of my mouth; a thick, filmy veil gathered before my sight; and there I stood like one turned to stone. But upon being frequently reassured by her gentle manner and kind words, I at length controlled my emotions, and, seating myself at her feet, awaited her communication.

"Ann, you are not happy here?"

I said nothing, but she understood my look.

"Were you happy at home?"

"I was;" and the words were scarcely audible.

"Did they treat you kindly there?"

"Indeed they did; and there I had a mother, and was not lonely."

"They did not beat you?"

"No, no, they did not," and large tears gushed from my burning eyes;—for I remembered with anguish, how many a smarting blow had been given to me by Mr. Jones, how many a cuff by Mr. Peterkin, and ten thousand knocks, pinches, and tortures, by the young ladies.

"Don't weep, child," said Miss Bradly, in a soothing tone, and she laid her arm caressingly around my neck. This kindness was too much for my fortitude, and bursting through all restraints I gave vent to my feelings in a violent shower of tears. She very wisely allowed me some time for the gratification of this luxury. I at length composed myself, and begged her pardon for this seeming disrespect.

"But ah, my dear lady, you have spoken so kindly to me that I forgot myself."

"No apology, my child, I tell you again that I am your friend, and with me you can be perfectly free. Look upon me as a sister; but now that your excited feelings have become allayed, let me ask you why your master sold you?"

I explained to her that it was necessary to the equal division of the estate that some of the slaves should be sold, and that I was among the number.

"A bad institution is this one of slavery. What fearful entailments of anguish! Manage it as the most humane will, or can, still it has horrible results. Witness your separation from your mother. Did these thoughts never occur to you?"

I looked surprised, but dared not tell her that often had vague doubts of the justice of slavery crossed my mind. Ah, too much I feared the lash, and I answered only by a mournful look of assent.

"Ann, did you never hear of the Abolition Society?"

I shook my head. She paused, as if doubtful of the propriety of making a disclosure; but at length the better principle triumphed, and she said, "There is in the Northern States an organization which devotes its energies and very life to the cause of the slave. They wish to abolish the shameful system, and make you and all your persecuted race as free and happy as the whites."

"Does there really exist such a society; or is it only a wild fable that you tell me, for the purpose of allaying my present agony?"

"No, child; I do not deceive you. This noble and beneficent society really lives; but it does not, I regret to say, flourish as it should."

"And why?" I asked, whilst a new wonder was fastening on my mind.

"Because," she answered, "the larger portion of the whites are mean and avaricious enough to desire, for the sake of pecuniary aggrandizement, the enslavement of a race, whom the force of education and hereditary prejudice have taught them to regard as their own property."

I did but dimly conceive her meaning. A slow light was breaking through my cloudy brain, kindling and inflaming hopes that now shine like beacons over the far waste of memory. Should I, could I, ever be free? Oh, bright and glorious dream! how it did sparkle in my soul, and cheer me through the lonely hours of bondage! This hope, this shadow of a hope, shone like a mirage far away upon the horizon of a clouded future.

Miss Bradly looked thoughtfully at me, as if watching the effect of her words; but she could not see that the seed which she had planted, perhaps carelessly, was destined to fructify and flourish through the coming seasons. I longed to pour out my heart to her; for she had, by this ready "sesame," unlocked its deepest chambers. I dared not unfold even to her the wild dreams and strange hopes which I was indulging.

I spied Melinda coming up, and signified to Miss Bradly that it would be unsafe to prolong the conversation, and quickly she departed; not, however, without reassuring me of the interest which she felt in my fate.

"What was Miss Emily Bradly talking wid you 'bout?" demanded Melinda, in a surly tone.

"Nothing that concerns you," I answered.

"Well, but you'll see that it consarns yerself, when I goes and tells Masser on you."

"What can you tell him on me?"

complacently to myself, I proceeded to Miss Jane's room, to request her to come and look at it, and express her opinion.

On reaching her apartment, I found her dressed with great care, in a pink silk, with a rich lace berthé, and pearl ornaments. Her red hair was oiled until its fiery hue had darkened into a becoming auburn, and the metallic polish of the French powder had effectually concealed the huge freckles which spotted her cheeks.

Dropping a low courtesy, I requested her to come with me to the dining-room and inspect my work. With a smile, she followed, and upon examination, seemed well pleased.

"Now, Ann, if you do well in officiating, it will be well for you; but if you fail, if you make one mistake, you had better never been born, for," and she grasped me strongly by the shoulder, "I will flay you alive; you shall ache and smart in every limb and nerve."

Terror-stricken at this threat, I made the most earnest promises to exert my very best energies. Yet her angry manner and threatening words so unnerved me, that I was not able to go on with the work in the same spirit in which I had begun, for we all know what a paralysis fear is to exertion.

I stepped out on the balcony for some purpose, and there, standing at the end of the gallery, but partially concealed by the clematis blossoms, stood Miss Jane, and a tall gentleman was leaning over the railing talking very earnestly to her. In that uncertain light I could see the flash of her eye and the crimson glow of her cheek. She was twirling and tearing to pieces, petal by petal, a beautiful rose which she held in her hand. Here, I thought here is happiness; this woman lóves and is beloved. She has tasted of that one drop which sweetens the whole cup of existence. Oh, what a thing it is to be free—free and independent, with power and privilege to go whithersoever you choose, with no cowardly fear, no dread of espionage, with the right to hold your head proudly aloft, and return glance for glance, not shrink and cower before the white man's look, as we poor slaves must do. But not many moments could

I thus spend in thought, and well, perhaps, it was for me that duty broke short all such unavailing regrets.

Hastening back to the dining-room, I gave another inquiring look at the table, fearful that some article had been omitted. Satisfying myself on this point, I moved on to the kitchen, where Aunt Polly was busy frying a chicken.

"Here, child," she exclaimed, "look in thar at them biscuits. See is they done. Oh, that's prime, browning beautiful-like," she said, as I drew from the stove a pan of nice biscuits, "and this ar' chicken is mighty nice. Oh, but it will make the young gemman smack his lips," and wiping the perspiration from her sooty brow, she drew a long breath, and seated herself upon a broken stool.

"Wal, this ar' nigger is tired. I's bin cooking now this twelve years, and never has I had 'mission' to let my old man come to see me, or I to go see him."

The children, with eyes wide open, gathered round Aunt Polly to hear a recital of her wrongs. "Laws-a-marcy, sights I's seen in my times, and often it 'pears like I's lost my senses. I tells you, yous only got to look at this ar' back to know what I's went through." Hereupon she exposed her back and arms, which were frightfully scarred.

"This ar' scar," and she pointed to a very deep one on her left shoulder, "Masser gib me kase I cried when he sold my oldest son; poor Jim, he was sent down the river, and I've never hearn from him since." She wiped a stray tear from her old eyes.

"Oh me! 'tis long time since my eyes hab watered, and now these tears do feel so quare. Poor Jim is down the river, Johnny is dead, and Lucy is sold somewhar, so I have neither chick nor child. What's I got to live fur?"

This brought fresh to my mind recollections of my own mother's grief, when she was forced to give me up, and I could not restrain my tears.

"What fur you crying, child?" she asked. "It puts me in mind ov my poor little Luce, she used to cry this way whenever anything happened to me. Oh, many is the time she screamed if master struck me."

"Poor Aunt Polly," I said, as I walked up to her side, "I do pity you. I will be kind to you; I'll be your daughter."

She looked up with a wild stare, and with a deep earnestness seized hold of my out-stretched hand; then dropping it suddenly, she murmured,

"No, no, you ain't my darter, you comes to me with saft words, but you is jest like Lindy and all the rest of 'em; you'll go to the house and tell tales to the white folks on me. No, I'll not trust any of you."

Springing suddenly into the room, with his eyes flaming, came Jones, and, cracking his whip right, and left, he struck each of the listening group. I retreated hastily to an extreme corner of the kitchen, where, unobserved by him, I could watch the affray.

"You devilish old wretch, Polly, what are you gabbling and snubbling here about? Up with your old hide, and git yer supper ready. Don't you know thar is company in the house?" and here he gave another sharp cut of the whip, which descended upon that poor old scarred back with a cruel force, and tore open old cicatriced wounds. The victim did not scream, nor shrink, nor murmur; but her features resumed their wonted hard, encrusted expression, and, rising up from her seat, she went on with her usual work.

"Now, cut like the wind," he added, as he flourished his whip in the direction of the young blacks, who had been the interested auditors of Aunt Polly's hair-breadth escapes, and quick as lightning they were off to their respective quarters, whilst I proceeded to assist Aunt Polly in dishing up the supper.

"This chicken," said I, in a tone of encouragement, "is beautifully cooked. How brown it is, and oh, what a delightful savory odor."

"I'll be bound the white folks will find fault wid it. Nobody ever did please Miss Jane. Her is got some of the most perkuler notions 'bout cookin'. I knows she'll be kommin' out here, makin' a fuss 'long wid me 'bout dis same supper," and the old woman shook her head knowingly.

I made no reply, for I feared the re-appearance of Mr. Jones, and too often and too painfully had I felt the sting of his lash, to be guilty of any wanton provocation of its severity.

Silently, but with bitter thoughts curdling my life-blood, did I arrange the steaming cookies upon the luxurious board, and then, with a deferential air, sought the parlor, and bade them walk out to tea.

I found Miss Jane seated near a fine rosewood piano, and standing beside her was a gentleman, the same whom I had observed with her upon the verandah. Miss Matilda was at the window, looking out upon the western heaven. I spoke in a soft tone, asking them, "Please walk out to tea." The young gentleman rose, and offered his arm to Miss Jane, which was graciously accepted, and Miss Matilda followed. I swung the dining-room door open with great pomp and ceremony, for I knew that anything showy or grand, either in the furniture of a house or the deportment of a servant, would be acceptable to Miss Jane. Fashion, or style, was the god of her worship, and she often declared that her principal objection to the negro, was his great want of style in thought and action. She was not deep enough to see, that, fathoms down below the surface, in all the crudity of ignorance, lay a stratum of this same style, so much worshipped by herself. Does not the African, in his love of gaud, show, and tinsel, his odd and grotesque decorations of his person, exhibit a love of style? But she was not philosopher enough to see that this was a symptom of the same taste, though ungarnished and semi-barbarous.

The supper passed off very handsomely, so far as my part was concerned. I carried the cups round on a silver salver to each one; served them with chicken, plied them with cakes, confections, &c., and interspersed my performance with innumerable courtesies, bows and scrapes.

"Ah," said Miss Jane to the gentleman, "ah, Mr. Somerville, you have visited us at the wrong season; you should be here takin' on in the way they does? Jist look at the sight o' money that has bin laid out in that ar' tom-foolery."

This was a sort of soliloquy spoken in a tone audible enough to be distinct to us.

He drew his cob-pipe from his mouth, and a huge volume of smoke curled round his head, and filled the room with the aroma of tobacco.

"Now," he continued, "they does not treat me wid any perliteness. They thinks they knows a power more than I does; but if they don't cut their cards square, I'll cut them short of a nigger or two, and make John all the richer by it."

Lindy cut her eye knowingly at this, and gave me rather a strong nudge with her elbow.

"Keep still thar, gals, and don't rattle them cups and sassers so powerful hard."

By this time Lindy had finished the assortment of the silver, and had carefully stowed it away in a willow-basket, ready to be delivered to Miss Jane, and thence consigned to the drawer, where it would remain in statu quo until the timely advent of another guest.

"Now," she said, "I am ready to wipe the dishes, while you wash."

Thereupon I handed her a saucer, which, in her carelessness, she let slip from her hand, and it fell upon the floor, and there, with great consternation, I beheld it lying, shattered to fragments. Mr. Peterkin sprang to his feet, glad of an excuse to vent his temper upon some one.

"Which of you cussed wretches did this?"

"'Twas Ann, master! She let it fall afore I got my hand on it.

Ere I had time to vindicate myself from the charge, his iron arm felled me to the floor, and his boot-like foot was placed upon my shrinking chest.

"You d—n yallow hussy, does you think I buys such expensive chany-ware for you to break up in this ar' way? No, you 'bominable wench, I'll have revenge out of your saffer'n hide. Here, Lindy, fetch me that cowhide."

"Mercy, master, mercy," I cried, when he had removed his foot from my breast, and my breath seemed to come again. "Oh, listen to me; it was not I who broke the saucer, it was only an accident; but oh, in God's name, have mercy on me and Lindy."

"Yes, I'll tache you what marcy is. Here, quick, some of you darkies, bring me a rope and light. I'm goin' to take this gal to the whippin'-post."

This overcame me, for, though I had often been cruelly beaten, yet had I escaped the odium of the "post;" and now for what I had not done, and for a thing which, at the worst, was but an accident, to bear the disgrace and the pain of a public whipping, seemed to me beyond endurance. I fell on my knees before him:

"Oh, master, please pardon me; spare me this time. I have got a half-dollar that Master Edward gave me when you bought me, I will give you that to pay for the saucer, but please do not beat me."

With a wild, fiendish grin, he caught me by the hair and swung me round until I half fainted with pain.

"No, you wretch, I'll git my satisfaction out of yer body yit, and I'll be bound, afore this night's work is done, yer yallow hide will be well marked."

A deadly, cold sensation crept over me, and a feeling as of crawling adders seemed possessing my nerves. With all my soul pleading in my eyes I looked at Mr. Peterkin; but one glance of his fiendish face made my soul quail with even a newer horror. I turned my gaze from him to Jones, but the red glare of a demon lighted up his frantic eye, and the words of a profane bravo were on his lips. From him I turned to poor, hardened, obdurate old Nace, but he seemed to be linked and leagued with my torturers.

"Oh, Lindy," I cried, as she came up with a bunch of cord in her hand, "be kind, tell the truth, maybe master will forgive you. You are an older servant, better known and valued in the family. Oh, let your heart triumph. Speak the truth, and free me from the torture that awaits me. Oh, think of me, away off here, separated from my mother, with no friend. Oh, pity me, and do acknowledge that you broke it."

"Well, you is crazy, you knows dat I never touched de sacer," and she laughed heartily.

"Come along wid you all. Now fur fun," cried Nace.

"Hold your old jaw," said Jones, and he raised his whip. Nace cowered like a criminal, and made some polite speech to "Massa Jones," and Mr. Peterkin possessed himself of the rope which Lindy had brought.

"Now hold yer hands here," he said to me.

For one moment I hesitated. I could not summon courage to offer my hands. It was the only resistance that I had ever dared to make. A severe blow from the overseer's riding-whip reminded me that I was still a slave, and dared have no will save that of my master. This blow, which struck the back of my head, laid me half-lifeless upon the floor. Whilst in this condition old Nace, at the command of his master, bound the rope tightly around my crossed arms and dragged me to the place of torment.

The motion or exertion of being pulled along over the ground, restored me to full consciousness. With a haggard eye I looked up to the still blue heaven, where the holy stars yet held their silent vigil; and the serene moon moved on in her starry track, never once heeding the dire cruelty, over which her pale beam shed its friendly light. "Oh," thought I, "is there no mercy throned on high? Are there no spirits in earth, air, or sky, to lend me their gracious influence? Does God look down with kindness upon injustice like this? Or, does He, too, curse me in my sorrow, and in His wrath turn away His glorious face from my supplication, and say 'a servant of servants shalt thou be?'" These wild, rebellious thoughts only crossed my mind; they did not linger there. No, like the breath-stain upon the polished surface of the mirror, they only soiled for a moment the shining faith which in my soul reflected the perfect goodness of that God who never forgets the humblest of His children, and who makes no distinction of color or of race. The consoling promise, "He chasteneth whom He loveth," flashed through my brain with its blessed assurance, and reconciled me to a heroic endurance. Far away I strained my gaze to the starry heaven, and I could almost fancy the sky breaking asunder and disclosing the wondrous splendors which were beheld by the rapt Apostle on the isle of Patmos! Oh, transfiguring power of faith! Thou hast a wand more potent than that of fancy, and a vision brighter than the dreams of enchantment! What was it that reconciled me to the horrible tortures which were awaiting me? Surely, 'twas faith alone that sustained me. The present scene faded away from my vision, and, in fancy, I stood in the lonely garden of Gethsemane. I saw the darkness and gloom that overshadowed the earth, when, deserted by His disciples, our blessed Lord prayed alone. I heard the sighs and groans that burst from His tortured breast. I saw the bloody sweat, as prostrate on the earth he lay in the tribulation of mortal agony. I saw the inhuman captors, headed by one of His chosen twelve, come to seize his sacred person. I saw his face uplifted to the mournful heavens, as He prayed to His Father to remove the cup of sorrow. I saw Him bound and led away to death, without a friend to solace Him. Through the various stages of His awful passion, even to the Mount of Crucifixion, to the bloody and sacred Calvary, I followed my Master. I saw Him nailed to the cross, spit upon, vilified and abused, with the thorny crown pressed upon His brow. I heard the rabble shout; then I saw the solemn mystery of Nature, that did attestation to the awful fact that a fiendish work had been done and the prophecy fulfilled. The vail of the great temple was rent, the sun overcast, and the moon turned to blood; and in my ecstasy of passion, I could have shouted, Great is Jesus of Nazareth!! Then I beheld Him triumphing over the powers of darkness and death, when, robed in the white garments of the grave, He broke through the rocky sepulchre, and stood before the affrighted guards. His work was done, the propitiation had been made, and He went to His Father. This same Jesus, whom the civilized world now worship as their Lord, was once lowly, outcast, and despised; born of the most hated people of the world, belonging to a race despised alike by Jew and Gentile; laid in the manger of a stable at Bethlehem, with no earthly possessions, having not whereon to lay His weary head; buffetted, spit upon; condemned by the high priests and the doctors of law; branded as an impostor, and put to an ignominious death, with every demonstration of public contempt; crucified between two thieves; this Jesus is worshipped now by those who wear purple and fine linen. The class which once scorned Him, now offer at His shrine frankincense and myrrh; but, in their adoration of the despised Nazarene, they never remember that He has declared, not once, but many times, that the poor and the lowly are His people. "Forasmuch as you did it unto one of these you did it unto me." Then let the African trust and hope on—let him still weep and pray in Gethsemane, for a cloud hangs round about him, and when he prays for the removal of this cup of bondage, let him remember to ask, as his blessed Master did, "Thy will, oh Father, and not our own, be done;" still trust in Him who calmed the raging tempest; trust in Jesus of Nazareth! Look beyond the cross, to Christ.

These thoughts had power to cheer; and, fortified by faith and religion, the trial seemed to me easy to bear. One prayer I murmured, and my soul said to my body, "pass under the rod;" and the cup which my Father has given me to drink must be drained, even to the dregs.

In this state of mind, with a moveless eye I looked upon the whipping-post, which loomed up before me like an ogre.

This was a quadri-lateral post, about eight feet in height, having iron clasps on two opposing sides, in which the wrists and ankles were tightly secured.

"Now, Lindy," cried Jones, "jerk off that gal's rigging, I am anxious to put some marks on her yellow skin."

I knew that resistance was vain; so I submitted to have my clothes torn from my body; for modesty, so much commended in a white woman, is in a negro pronounced affectation.

Jones drew down a huge cow-hide, which he dipped in a barrel of brine that stood near the post.

"I guess this will sting," he said, as he flourished the whip toward me.

"Leave that thin slip on me, Lindy," I ventured to ask; for I dreaded the exposure of my person even more than the whipping.

"None of your cussed impedence; strip off naked. What is a nigger's hide more than a hog's?" cried Jones. Lindy and Nace tore the last article of clothing from my back. I felt my soul shiver and shudder at this; but what could I do? I could pray—thank God, I could pray!

I then submitted to have Nace clasp the iron cuffs around my hands and ankles, and there I stood, a revolting spectacle. With what misery I listened to obscene and ribald jests from my master and his overseer!

"Now, Jones," said Mr. Peterkin, "I want to give that gal the first lick, which will lay the flesh open to the bone."

"Well, Mr. Peterkin, here is the whip; now you can lay on."

"No, confound your whip; I wants that cow-hide, and here, let me dip it well into the brine. I want to give her a real good warmin'; one that she'll 'member for a long time."

During this time I had remained motionless. My heart was lifted to God in silent prayer. Oh, shall I, can I, ever forget that scene? There, in the saintly stillness of the summer night, where the deep, o'ershadowing heavens preached a sermon of peace, there I was loaded with contumely, bound hand and foot in irons, with jeering faces around, vulgar eyes glaring on my uncovered body, and two inhuman men about to lash me to the bone.

The first lick from Mr. Peterkin laid my back open. I writhed, I wrestled; but blow after blow descended, each harder than the preceding one. I shrieked, I screamed, I pleaded, I prayed, but there was no mercy shown me. Mr. Peterkin having fully gratified and quenched his spleen, turned to Mr. Jones, and said, "Now is yer turn; you can beat her as much as you please, only jist leave a bit o' life in her, is all I cares for."

"Yes; I'll not spile her for the market; but I does want to take a little of the d——d pride out of her."

"Now, boys"—for by this time all the slaves on the place, save Aunt Polly, had assembled round the post—"you will see what a true stroke I ken make; but darn my buttons if I doesn't think Mr. Peterkin has drawn all the blood."

So saying, Jones drew back the cow-hide at arm's length, and, making a few evolutions with his body, took what he called "sure aim." I closed my eyes in terror. More from the terrible pain, than from the frantic shoutings of the crowd, I knew that Mr. Jones had given a lick that he called "true blue." The exultation of the negroes in Master Jones' triumph was scarcely audible to my ears; for a cold, clammy sensation was stealing over my frame; my breath was growing feebler and feebler, and a soft melody, as of lulling summer fountains, was gently sounding in my ears; and, as if gliding away on a moonbeam, I passed from all consciousness of pain. A sweet oblivion, like that sleep which announces to the wearied, fever-sick patient, that his hour of rest has come, fell upon me! It was not a dreamful sensibility, filled with the chaos of fragmentary visions, but a rest where the mind, nay, the very soul, seemed to sleep with the body.

How long this stupor lasted I am unable to say; but when I awoke, I was lying on a rough bed, a face dark, haggard, scarred and worn, was bending over me. Disfigured as was that visage, it was pleasant to me, for it was human. I opened my eyes, then closed them languidly, re-opened them, then closed them again.

"Now, chile, I thinks you is a leetle better," said the dark-faced woman, whom I recognized as Aunt Polly; but I was too weak, too wandering in mind, to talk, and I closed my eyes and slept again.

CHAPTER VI.

RESTORED CONSCIOUSNESS—AUNT POLLY'S ACCOUNT OF MY MIRACULOUS RETURN TO LIFE—THE MASTER'S AFFRAY WITH THE OVERSEER.

When I awoke (for I was afterwards told by my good nurse that I had slept four days), I was lying on the same rude bed; but a cool, clear sensation overspread my system. I had full and active possession of my mental faculties. I rose and sat upright in the bed, and looked around me. It was the deep hour of night. A little iron lamp was upon the hearth, and, for want of a supply of oil, the wick was burning low, flinging a red glare through the dismal room. Upon a broken stool sat Aunt Polly, her head resting upon her breast, in what nurses call a "stolen nap." Amy and three other children were sleeping in a bed opposite me.

In a few moments I was able to recall the whole of the scenes through which I had passed, while consciousness remained; and I raised my eyes to God in gratitude for my partial deliverance from pain and suffering. Very softly I stole from my bed, and, wrapping an old coverlet round my shoulders, opened the door, and looked out upon the clear, star-light night. Of the vague thoughts that passed through my mind I will not now speak, though they were far from pleasant or consolatory.

The fresh night air, which began to have a touch of the frost of the advancing autumn, blew cheerily in the room, and it fell with an awakening power upon the brow of Aunt Polly.

"Law, chile, is dat you stannin' in de dor? What for you git up out en yer warm bed, and go stand in the night-ar?

"Because I feel so well, and this pleasant air seems to brace my frame, and encourage my mind."

CHAPTER X.

THE CONVERSATION IN WHICH FEAR AND SUSPICION ARE AROUSED—THE YOUNG MASTER.

It must have been long after midnight when I awoke. I do not remember whether I had dreamed or not, but the slumber had brought refreshment to my body and peace to my heart.

I was aroused by the sound of voices, in a suppressed whisper, or rather in a tone slightly above a whisper. I thought I detected the voice of Lindy, and, as I rose from my recumbent posture, I caught sight of a figure flitting round the gable of the house. I followed, but there was nothing visible. The pale moonlight slept lovingly upon the dwelling and the roofs of the out-buildings. Whither could the figure have fled? There was no sign of any one having been there. Slowly and sadly I directed my steps toward Aunt Polly's cabin. I opened the door cautiously, not wishing to disturb her; but easy and noiseless as were my motions, they roused that faithful creature. She sprang from the bed, exclaiming:

"La, Ann, whar has yer bin? I has bin so oneasy 'bout yer."

With my native honesty I explained to her that I had been beguiled by the melody of a human voice, and had lingered long out in the autumn moonlight.

"Yes; but, chile, you'll be sick. Sleepin' out a doors is berry onwholesome like."

"Yes; but, Aunt Polly, there is an interior heat which no autumnal frost has power to chill."

"Yes, chile, you does talk so pretty, like dem ar' great white scholards. Many times I has wondered how a poor darkie could larn so much. Now it 'pears to me as if you knowed much as any ob 'em. I don't tink Miss Bradly hersef talks any better dan you does."

"Oh, Aunt Polly, your praise is sweet to me; but then, you must remember not to do me more than justice. I am a poor, illiterate mulatto girl, who has indeed improved the modicum of time allowed her for self-culture; yet, when I hear such ladies as Miss Bradly talk, I feel how far inferior I am to the queens of the white tribe Often I ask myself why is this? Is it because my face is colored? But then there is a voice, deep down in my soul, that rejects such a conclusion as slanderous. Oh, give me but opportunity, and I will strive to equal them in learning."

"I don't see-no use in yer wanting to larn, when you is nothing but a poor slave. But I does think the gift of fine speech mighty valable."

And here is another thing upon which I would generalize. Does it not argue the possession of native mind—the immense value the African places upon words—the high-flown and broad-sounding words that he usually employs? The ludicrous attempts which the most untutored make at grandiloquence, should not so much provoke mirth as admiration in the more reflective of the white race. Through what barriers and obstacles do not their minds struggle to force a way up to the light. I have often been astonished at the quickness with which they seized upon expressions, and the accuracy with which they would apply them. Every crude attempt which they make toward self-culture is laughed at and scorned by the master, or treated as the most puerile folly. No encouragement is given them. If, by almost superhuman effort, they gain knowledge, why they may; but, unaided and alone, they must work, as I have done. Moreover, I have been wonder-stricken at the facility with which the negro-boy acquires learning. 'Tis as though the rudiments of the school came to him by flashes of intuition. He is allowed only a couple of hours on Sunday afternoons for recitations, and such odd moments during the week as he can catch to prepare his lessons; for, a servant-boy often caught with his book in hand, on the whiteness of his cheek; the veins in his forehead lay like heavy cords, and his very hair seemed to sparkle. He looked as one inspired. This was unobserved by his parent, who hastily strode away to find more willing listeners. I tarried in a place where, unnoticed by others, I commanded a good out-look. I saw young master clasp his hands fervently, and heard him passionately exclaim — "How much longer, oh, how much longer shall this be?" Then slowly walking down his favorite path, he was lost to my vision. "Blessed youth, heaven-missioned, if thou wouldst only speak to me! One word of consolation from God-anointed lips like thine, would soothe even the sting of bondage; but no," I added, "that earnest look, that gentle tone, tell perhaps as much as it is necessary for me to know. This silence proceeds from some noble motive. Soon enough he will make himself known to us."

In a little while the news of Lindy's departure had spread through the neighborhood like a flame. Our yard and house were filled with men come to offer their services to their neighbor, who, from his wealth, was considered a sort of magnate among them.

Pretty soon they were mounted on horses, and armed to the teeth, each one with a horn fastened to his belt, galloping off in quest of the poor fugitive. And is this thing done beneath the influence of civilized laws, and by men calling themselves Christians? What has armed those twelve men with pistols, and sent them on an excusion like this? Is it to redeem a brother from a band of lawless robbers, who hold him in captivity? Is it to right some individual wrong? Is it to take part with the weak and oppressed against the strong and the overbearing? No, no, my friends, on no such noble mission as this have they gone. No purpose of high emprise has made them buckle on the sword and prime the pistol. A poor, lone female, who, through years, has been beaten, tyrannized over, and abused, has ventured out to seek what this constitution professes to secure to every one—liberty. Barefoot and alone, she has gone forth; and 'tis to bring her back to a vile and brutal slavery that these men have sallied out, regardless of her sex, her destitution, and her misery. They have set out either to recapture her or to shoot her down in her tracks like a dog. And this is a system which Christian men speak of as heaven-ordained! This is a thing countenanced by freemen, whose highest national boast is, that theirs is the land of liberty, equality, and free-rights! These are the people who yearly send large sums to Ireland; who pray for the liberation of Hungary; who wish to transmit armed forces across the Atlantic to aid vassal States in securing their liberty! These are they who talk so largely of Cuba, expend so much sympathy upon the oppressed of other lands, and predict the downfall of England for her oppressive form of government! Oh, America! "first pluck the beam out of thine own eye, then shalt thou see more clearly the mote that is in thy brother's."

When I watched those armed men ride away, in such high courage and eagerness for the hunt, I thought of Lindy, poor, lone girl, fatigued, worn and jaded, suffering from thirst and hunger; her feet torn and bruised with toil, hiding away in bogs and marshes, with an ear painfully acute to every sound. I thought of this, and all the resentment I had ever felt toward her faded away as a vapor.

All that day the house was in a state of intense excitement. The servants could not work with their usual assiduity. Indeed, such was the excitement, even of the white family, that we were not strictly required to labor.

Miss Jane gave me some fancy-sewing to do for her. Taking it with me to Aunt Polly's cabin, intending to talk with her whilst time was allowed me, I was surprised and pleased to find the old woman still asleep. "It will do her good," I thought, "she needs rest, poor creature! And that blow was given to her on my account! How much I would rather have received it myself." I then examined her head, and was glad to find no mark or bruise; so I hoped that with a good sleep she would wake up quite well. I seated myself on an old stool, originates and involves so many crimes! Now, here was a kind, honest-hearted woman, who felt assured of the criminality of slavery; yet, as it is recognized and approved by law, she could not, save at the risk of social position, pecuniary loss and private inconvenience, even express an opinion against it. I was the oppressed slave of one of her wealthy neighbors; she dared not offer me even a word of pity, but needs must outrage all my nature by telling me that I had a "good home, kind mistresses and a good master!" Oh, bitter mockery of torn and lacerated feelings! My blood curdled as I listened. How much I longed to fling aside the servility at which my whole soul revolted, and tell her, with a proud voice, how poorly I thought she supported the dignity of a true womanhood, when thus, for the poor reward of gold, she could smile at, and even encourage, a system which is at war with the best interest of human nature; which aims a deadly blow at the very machinery of society; aye, attacks the noble and venerable institution of marriage, and breaks asunder ties which God has commanded us to reverence! This is the policy of that institution, which Southern people swear they will support even with their life-blood! I have ransacked my brain to find out a clue to the wondrous infatuation. I have known, during the years of my servitude, men who had invested more than half of their wealth in slaves; and he is generally accounted the greatest gentleman, who owns the most negroes. Now, there is a reason for the Louisiana or Mississippi planter's investing largely in this sort of property; but why the Kentucky farmer should wish to own slaves, is a mystery: surely it cannot be for the petty ambition of holding human beings in bondage, lording it over immortal souls! Oh, perverse and strange human nature! Thoughts like these, with a lightning-like power, drove through my brain and influenced my mind against Mrs. Mandy, who, I doubt not, was, at heart, a kind, well-meaning woman. How can the slave be a philanthropist?

Without saying anything whereby my safety could be imperilled, I left Mrs. Mandy's residence. When I had walked about a hundred yards from the house, I turned and looked back, and was surprised to see her looking after me. "Oh, white woman," I inwardly exclaimed, "nursed in luxury, reared in the lap of bounty, with friends, home and kindred, that mortal power cannot tear you from, how can you pity the poor, oppressed slave, who has no liberty, no right, no father, no brother, or friend, only as the white man chooses he shall have!" Who could expect these children of wealth, fostered by prosperity, and protected by the law, to feel for the ignorant negro, who through ages and generations has been crushed and kept in ignorance? We are told to love our masters! Why should we? Are we dogs to lick the hand that strikes us? Or are we men and women with never-dying souls—men and women unprotected in the very land they have toiled to beautify and adorn! Oh, little, little do ye know, my proud, free brothers and sisters in the North, of all the misery we endure, or of the throes of soul that we have! The humblest of us feel that we are deprived of something that we are entitled to by the law of God and nature.

I rambled on through the woods, wrapped in the shadows of gloom and misanthropy. "Why," I asked myself, "can't I be a hog or dog to come at the call of my owner? Would it not be better for me if I could repress all the lofty emotions and generous impulses of my soul, and become a spiritless thing? I would swap natures with the lowest insect, the basest serpent that crawls upon the earth. Oh, that I could quench this thirsty spirit, satisfy this hungry heart, that craveth so madly the food and drink of knowledge! Is it right to conquer the spirit, which God has given us? Is it best for a high-souled being to sit supinely down and bear the vile trammels of an unnatural and immoral bondage? Are these aspirings sent us from above? Are they wings lent the spirit from an angel? Or must they be clipped and crushed as belonging to the evil spirit?" As I walked on, in this state of mind, I neared the spot where I had beheld the interesting stranger.

To my surprise and joy I found him still there, occupied as [illegible] SOLD IN CONNECTICUT.

[illegible] slavery was different in the North [illegible] the North than the North they were admitted to [illegible] of the human family. I was told when [illegible] that some of the people said that slaves [illegible] souls, and that they would never go to heaven, [illegible] do ever so well.

[illegible] mother was born in the State of New York, I [illegible] Columbia county. He had, I think, three [illegible] masters in that State, one by the name of [illegible], and he was Gen. Van Rensaeller's slave in the time of the Revolution, and was a soldier in that war; he was then owned by a man whose name was Rutser, and then was owned in Connecticut, in Salisbury, and then by the minister in North Canaan.

My mother was born in old Virginia, in Loudin county; I do not remember the name of the town. The minister of North Canaan, whose name was Thompson, went to Virginia for a wife, or she came to him; in some way they got together, so that they became man and wife. He removed her to Canaan, and she brought her slaves with her, and my mother was one of them. I think there were two of my mother's brothers also. The Rev. Mr. Thompson, as he was then called, bought my father, and he was married to my mother by him. Mr. Thompson ministered to the people of Canaan in holy things; [illegible] as soon [illegible] full out; the South [illegible] that the North would not [illegible] The [illegible] who told my father if she only had him South, [illegible] she could have at her call a half dozen [illegible] would have him stripped and flogged until he [illegible] cut in strings, and see if he would do as she [illegible] him. She told him, You mind, boy, I will have [illegible] there yet, and you will get your pay for all [illegible] have done. My father was a man of consider[illegible] muscular strength, and was not easily frightened into obedience. I have heard my mother say [illegible] has often seen her mother tied up and whipped until the blood ran across the floor in the room where she was tied and whipped.

Well, as I said, the South and the North could not agree; the South seceded and left the North; the minister's wife would not live North, and she and her husband picked up and went South, and left my father and mother in Canaan to work the farm, and they lived on the farm until I was eight years old. My mother had one child when she came from the South; I was the first she had after she was married. They had five children born in Canaan,—three died in infancy. I was born March 3d, 1790.

Mr. Thompson used to come up from Virginia and talk about our going South. He would pat me on the head and tell me what a fine boy I was. Once when he was in Canaan, he asked me if I would not like to go with him and drive the carriage for my [illegible] side you may [illegible] pickets they must [illegible] says he will kill the first man [illegible] them. They hesitated some; they [illegible] still, and stopped a short time, [illegible] against the door, it gave way, [illegible] went in. They found the landlady sit-[illegible] as composed as summer, with her knitting-[illegible] occasions of an arrest to go south as a slave! [illegible] found us not, although the room they last [illegible] into was the one we had occupied all the time [illegible] were in that house, sometimes one night, some-[illegible] a week, and then in the woods or elsewhere, [illegible] was thought best to keep out of the way.

The pic[illegible] returned to the land of Canaan to see what was to be the next move. The parson then proposed to give my father and mother and sister their freedom, if they would let him have the boys. That they would not do; but the boys he said he must have. As my brother was away, it was thought best that I should be away. I was sent to Mr. Pease, well-nigh Canaan, and kept rather dark. I was there for a time, and I went to stay with a man by the name of Camp, and was with him a time, and then I went to stay with a man by the name of Akins, and stayed with him a few days, and went to a man by the name of Foot, and was with him a few days. I went to another man by the name of Akins, and was there some time. The parson was not gone south yet, for he could not well give up his prey. He then proposed to sell the boys until they were twenty-five, [illegible] that was as long as the law of Connecticut [illegible] hold slaves, and he would give the other members of the family their freedom. It was finally thought best to do that if the purchasers that were acceptable could be found. Some friends were on the look-out. Finally a man by the name of Bingham was found; it was a man that my father was once a slave to; he would take my brother,—then a man by the name of Munger would buy me if they could agree. Mr. Bingham lived in Salisbury, Mr. Munger lived in Norfolk; the two men lived about fifteen miles apart, both in Connecticut.

The trade was made, and we two boys were sold for one hundred pounds a head, lawful money,—yes, sold by a man, a minister of the gospel in Connecticut, the land of steady habits. It would seem that the parson was a worshiper with the Athenians, as Paul said unto them when he stood on Mars Hill, he saw an inscription on one of their altars; and it would seem that the parson forgot or passed over the instruction of the apostle that God made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth.

The parson was a tall man, standing six feet in his boots, and had no legitimate children to be heirs to his ill-gotten gains. The bargain was made on the 12th of September, 1798. Then I was informed that I was sold to Mr. Munger, and must go and live with him. The man I did not know, but the thought of being sold, not knowing whether I was

[illegible] or sister could [illegible]
[illegible] could endure; the thought that I
[illegible] not there knew for how long, it
[illegible] and where were my parents? I [illegible] was not thought, but go I must. The [illegible] (I was to go the morning of the 13th)
[illegible] morning to me. The morning was clear, [illegible] a cloud. I was told where the man lived, [illegible] go, for he had bought me. I thought of [illegible] should I, oh! should I never see them
[illegible] As I was taught to obey my superiors, I set [illegible] it was a little over a mile. The way was long.
[illegible] alone. Tears ran down my cheeks. I then [illegible] for the first time that I was alone in the world, [illegible] home, no friends, and none to care for me. Tears
[illegible], but it did no good; I must go, and on I went.
And now sixty-five years have passed away since that [illegible]; those feelings are fresh in my memory. But [illegible] my way to my new home I saw my father; I will [illegible] attempt to describe my feelings when he told me [illegible] had taken rooms in the same neighborhood, and [illegible]ould be near me. That made the rough way
[illegible]ooth. I went on then cheerful and happy. I arrived at the place. I found a man with a small family; it consisted of himself and wife and three daughters. The oldest was near my age. The family appeared pleasant. I ate a bowl of bread and milk, and was told to mount a horse that was at the door with a bag of rye on his back, and ride to the field; that was about a mile off. The man went with me, and on the way we passed the house of Mrs.

Curtiss, where I met [illegible] this narrative of going for [illegible] son. We went to the field and [illegible] went home at night. The family [illegible] pleasant, and I felt pleased to think that the [illegible] had gone, for I was told that he went the same [illegible] that I went to my new home. In a short time [illegible] father and mother and sister came into the neighborhood to live. I was allowed to go and see them one evening in two weeks. They lived about sixty rods from where I lived. Things went on well. [illegible] very contented, and felt glad that the fear of [illegible] carried south was at an end. The person was out of town and out of mind. I soon became acquainted with Mrs. Curtiss' boys, for I passed the house where they lived every day, as Mr. Munger's farm was beyond where they lived. I soon was feeling contented and happy. There was one thing that was unfortunate for me; Mr. Munger was not a stout, strong man, and not very healthy, and had no other help but me, and of course I had many things to do beyond my strength. I do not complain of many things, yet there are two things more I will mention. One of them I feel to this day, and that I feel the most is that I did not have an opportunity to go to school as much as I should, for all the books I ever had in school were a spelling-book, a primer, a Testament, a reading-book called Third Part, and after that a Columbian Orator. My schooling was broken and unsteady after the first and second winters, as Mr. Munger had no help, and had to go something

Then, with prayer and heart-felt praise
To the God who crowned their days,
Laid them down to hours of slumber,
Such as angels love to number.

Pity not a home like this,
Lowly, yet so rich in bliss.
Pity those who ne'er can feel
They are one for woe or weal;
Who must toil from day to day,
'Neath a selfish master's sway;
And whose only joys arise
From the home beyond the skies!

THE Sabbath morning rose clear out of the starry night, and with it came the necessity of Abram's return to his plantation, in order to be ready for Monday's work. Sally was distressed at this immediate separation. He was much older than herself, and her young heart was happy to have something to cling to, and to call its own. She prepared him the best breakfast in her power from the remnants of the wedding table, and then, tying a handkerchief over her head, set out to accompany him as far as she was able, on his homeward way. Hand in hand they walked through the dewy fields, trying to encourage each other with the hope that there would come a time when they should know no separation. The merry birds flew singing above them, the early flowers gave out their odor, the pines waved their branches in the breeze, clad in the fresh green of spring. Sally tried to restrain her tears, but when they reached the bounds of her master's plantation, beyond which she could not go without special permission, they burst forth anew.

"I know I 's wicked, Abram, but I jest wish Mas'r Harry had to go 'way an' leave Missis like you leave me; I do! De white folks ken do jest as dey please, why can 't we?"

"Don't cry, Sally," said kind-hearted Abram, "I 'll come back an' see you soon as dey 'll let me."

Sally had thrown herself down beneath the shadow of a pine, and sat for some minutes quietly. At length she exclaimed:

"I 's wonderin' if de Lord knows how bad I feels dis mornin'. He had such heaps o' trouble, I spécs He 's sorry for us. Come an' kneel down, Abram, an' I 'll pray to Him de bes' way I ken."

Together they knelt, and in simple, broken words she poured out her heart to Him who never slights the humblest cry. A strange peace filled her soul, and, rising, she bade her husband a calm farewell. He was awed by the prayer, for he knew much less of religion than she, and promising to see her on Monday night, if possible, he turned away, and was soon lost to the gaze amid the somber pines.

It was high noon when Sally reached home. As she walked up the long avenue that led to the house, the first object which attracted her attention was the carriage of her old mistress before the door. Then her mother had come —her mother, whom she had not seen for months! She ran quickly to the house to see if it were so, and was told by one of the servants that "Ole Missis" had really returned. She had been prevented from reaching home the night before by finding one of the bridges gone on the road to Fayetteville, and had arrived about an hour previous. To Sally's eager inquiries for her mother, she answered, that, after helping her tired mistress to bed, she had left the house. "I specs she 's lookin' arter you, Sally; she took on powerful when she heard you 'd done got married."

Sally hastened to her mother's old cabin, which now was hers, and, sure enough, there she was sitting on the low bed. She looked so neat in her trim waiting-maid's dress, that her daughter, who had approached unperceived, could not help stopping to regard her with admiration. A moment, and she was in her arms.

"Oh, mother, I 's so glad you 've come."

"Chile, chile," said the mother, while unwonted tears ran down her cheeks, "what have ye done? De Lord knows I 'd rather have seen ye in yer grave than married. S'pose ye thought ye 'd be better off, but chile, yer mistaken. Mebbe Abram Williams is a good man, an 'll be kind to ye; but de kinder he is, an de more ye loves him, de worse ye 'll feel by an' by. Do n't I know? Did n't I love your father better than all de world, an' wa'nt he allers kep' way on de big plantation, till now dey say he 's sold to a speculator? An' den, when I laid out to take some comfort in my chil'n, an' worked so hard to take care of 'em, wan't dey all scattered an' carried off, de Lord knows whar, an' you only left in de ole cabin when I come home? Oh, Sally, gettin' married 's de beginnin' o' sorrow; my heart aches to think what ye 've got to bar! De white folks ken get married an' live happy all der days, but 'pears like dere 's no peace for us no whar."

"Don't talk so, mother. Abram says he'll ask Mas'r to let him come an' live on de place, an' den we'll have good times."

"No, chile, it's no use. I knows. Dat's allers de way. Ole Missis goin' away to-morrow, an' I shall have to leave ye to suffer as I've done."

Poor mother! poor daughter! Silent they sat with their arms around each other, till the sycamore trees threw their evening shadows across the door. They had no plans to talk over, no hopes to impart; for what plans can they form who have no independent will? and what individual hopes can they cherish who exist solely for the benefit of others?

Sally's usual light-heartedness was not proof against her mother's despair. There was nothing in the past to which they cared to turn, and the anticipated future weighed them down with pain. At length, the gathering twilight warned the mother that her services would be required by her mistress, and she rose to go.

"Good night, chile; I must go now. Missis 'll want me, an' I shan't see ye again. Ye'll be gone to de field 'fore I ken come down here in de mornin'. Do de bes' ye ken, an' tell Abram, yer mother says ye mus' be kind to each other while ye live togeder—de Lord knows how long dat 'll be! Try to please young Mas'r an' Missis, so 's to put off de evil day—but it 'll come, chile, it 'll come, an' ye mus' be spectin' on't. 'Bove all, do n't forget yer prars, 'cause if de Lord aint yer friend, whar 'll ye go?"

"Oh, mother, I 's allers a prayin'—'pears like it 's de greatest comfort I 's got."

"Well, chile, dat 's right. May de dear Lord bless ye! Far'well."

At daybreak the next morning, Sally was on her way to the rice-field. Her marriage had come and gone like any other incident in life, and now she must resume her daily toil. The hours went by slowly as she dropped the rice into the drills, and covered it lightly with her hoe. She had little disposition to talk with her companions, and had she desired it, it would not have been permitted. There was a new overseer on the plantation; a harsh, unfeeling man, who restricted the servants in every possible way. When the hot noon came on, they stopped to take their scanty dinner—a small piece of bread and meat, and some boiled rice. At a little distance was a

A HUSBAND SOLD.

SEE! the moon is over the hill;
Hark! the wind in the trees is still;
Only the stars shine out on high,
In the azure depths of the midnight sky.
The master sleeps in his downy bed,
And watch and care for a while have fled,
Wake, my children! and we 'll away,
Ere in the east is the dawn of day.
Whither? Alas! I know not whither
This side of the cold and fatal River!
The earth has many a pleasant dell
Where ye and I might be sheltered well,
But ne'er secure on the land or sea
Can the slave from his white pursuers be!
God of mercy, and truth, and right,
Guide our steps through the silent night!

THE master grew every day more reckless in his expenditures, and more unreasonable in his demands upon his servants. Among the household duties which Sally occasionally performed, was that of seeing that the milk was properly strained and taken care of. One morning her mistress was out of humor, and imagining that Sally had not taken pains with her work, she complained to her husband.

"Look here, Sally," said he, "do you put the milk in a pan that is n't washed?"

"Oh, no, mas'r, I takes partikler paine to have it clean."

"Do you mean to contradict your mistress?"

"I did n't, mas'r."

"You did n't, did you? I'll see!"

Seizing her by the arm, he whipped her severely, and at length desisting from very weariness, he called out, "Now see if you 'll tell the truth the next time."

Half crazed with pain and terror, she crept away to the field. She dared not neglect her tasks, and all through that wretched day she followed the plow, smarting from the blows. It was the crisis of her fate. Year after year she had suffered on, and now she felt that she could endure no longer. With her buoyant nature, she would not have despaired could she have seen one distant gleam of hope, but matters were daily getting worse on the plantation, and she knew not where to turn for light.

Revolving these things in her mind as she went her weary rounds, she came to the desperate resolution of running away, and with keen sharp air which prevails during some days of the winter months would speedily have finished them.

Although certain that they had come to a country where they would be treated as slaves, and subjected to hard work and hard treatment, without the smallest chance of ever again seeing their native land, yet the negroes upon coming ashore, and being allowed to stretch their limbs, and walk about a little—to refresh themselves in the salt water, and breathe the pure air of heaven — and, above all, being furnished with fresh provisions, it was astonishing to observe how their spirits revived: a change for the better appeared in their countenances, and they expressed their delight, by capering and singing. But no wonder, after all, when we consider the difference between the hold of a ship, containing four or five hundred negroes, surrounded with filth, and suffering from suffocation, and the fresh and grateful free air of heaven.

I would here observe, that in the preceding portion of my narrative, and also in that which is to follow, I have never had recourse to falsehood, in expressing what I have seen or heard; the case does not require it; the plain and simple truth will do more for the cause of the black man, than ten volumes of varnished fables: yea, one simple fact, related as it actually happened, will do more for our cause, than fifty exaggerated fabrications. To do justice, then, to the white man, I observed, that in dividing the negroes into lots for sale, the captain and mates were always consulted by the owners, and such of the slaves as it could be made out were related to one another, were put in the same lot. I remember one case, however, which created some sensation, even among the hardened slave-dealers.

By some oversight or mistake, a mother was put in one lot, and her only daughter, a fine girl of sixteen or seventeen in another, and when, after the sale, the purchasers were driving away their lots, (for, indeed, they were actually driven away, like four-footed beasts) the poor girl ran to her mother, and taking her by the hand, was proceeding up the wharf with her. But in a moment, this was discovered by the person who had purchased the girl—for a particular purpose, as it afterwards appeared. He instantly followed and seized the girl by the wrist, and although she could not speak a word of English, she manifested by her looks and voice, that she was not deficient in nature's eloquence. She threw her arms around the neck of her mother, who seemed equally moved; and it was not without much difficulty, and many hard blows of the cowskin, that they could be separated. Mr. Naylor here humanely interfered, and endeavoured to effect a compromise or bargain betwixt the planter who purchased the mother, and who resided 150 miles up the country, and the person who had purchased the daughter; but all to no effect. The latter, who resided within 20 miles of Charleston, would hearken to no terms; he had a particular purpose, as I have already said, for the girl, and would yield her up to no one.

sister, "really it is most annoying that I have no sooner got proper cooks than off you hurry them to auction." "Well, well, my dear! you know you are a very clever woman, and you would tire for want of employment if I did not oblige you in this way. I shall try and get you a fresh young girl or two next week, so say no more about it. You see it is always turning over a few hundred dollars."

I was also acquainted with a Mr. Dunnam, a boot and shoe maker, who made a regular traffic of breeding negroes, and had hardly ever less than fifteen or twenty negro children swarming in his back yard. He was a shrewd judge of the value of this peculiar kind of property. I remember his purchasing a negro girl, named Sally, about twenty years of age, with a child at her breast, in the year 1811, when prices were dull, for 350 dollars only. Sally soon found a husband among Mr. Dunnam's shoemakers; and by the year 1818, Sally had become the mother of five fine children; when as negroes were then selling at an extravagant price in consequence of the very high rates of cotton and rice, the knowing boot-maker brought the whole family to the Vendue table. I witnessed the sale personally, and can assure the reader that they brought 530 dollars a head, or, in all, 3180 dollars! Such enormous profits on the raising of negroes certainly offer a great temptation to men whose god is money.

It is still more to be deplored, that the love of money should operate so powerfully upon the mind of woman, as to destroy that natural delicacy of feeling which is one of the brightest ornaments of the softer sex. I was standing one day at the door of a grocery, in East Bay Street, when two white ladies, finely dressed, walking on the pavement, came up while a young black woman was conversing with me; the elder of the ladies stopped, and, drawing my female friend aside, asked her to whom she belonged. "I belong to nobody, ma'am," said the young woman, dropping a courtesy; "I do be free woman, ma'am." "Oh! very well, my good girl—never mind; I only thought you looked as if you would breed well!" The white ladies then went on their way. Is any comment here necessary?

I will just give one or two more examples. "But how did you become acquainted with these private scenes, Mr. Zamba?" some reader may ask. "Some of them through the intervention of Zillah; who, like the rest of her sex, was fond of a bit of gossip with her sister waiting-maids." One of these told her that when waiting on her young mistress, a Miss Treuman, in her bed-chamber, where also one or two of the young lady's sisters were present, Miss Treuman would lean back in her chair and say, "Now Dinah, come hither and rub my legs." Dinah forthwith kneeled down on the floor; and having pulled off the young lady's stockings, commenced in as gentle a manner as possible to manipulate the limbs of this Carolinian beauty for she really was a beauty: at least in outward appearance. "Rub a little harder now, Dinah; ah! that's a good wench, just so: ah! that'll do. Now, you black devil, have you scratched

"... The white children could tell their ages. I could not tell why I ought to be deprived of the same privilege. I was not allowed to make any inquiries of my master concerning it. He deemed all such inquiries on the part of a slave improper and impertinent, and evidence of a restless spirit."

"We were not regularly allowanced. Our food was coarse corn meal boiled. This was called mush. It was put into a large wooden tray or trough, and set down upon the ground. The children were then called, like so many pigs, and like so many pigs they would come and devour the mush; some with oyster shells, others with pieces of shingles, some with naked hands, and none with spoons. He that ate fastest go most; he that was strongest got the best place; and few left the trough satisfied."

"The more I read, the more I was lead to abhor and detest my enslavers. I could regard them in no other light than a band of successful robbers, who had left their homes, and gone to Africa, and stolen us from our homes, and in a strange land reduced us to slavery. I loathed them as being the meanest as well as the most wicked of men."...

"If at any one time of my life more than another, I was made to drink the bitterest drege of slavery, that time was during the first six months of my stay with Mr. Covey. We were worked in all weathers. It was never too hot or too cold; it could never rain, blow, hail or snow too hard for us to work in the field. Work, work, work, was scarcely more the order of the day than of the night. The longest days were too short for him. I was somewhat unmanageable when I first went there, but a few months of this discipline tamed me. Mr. Covey succeeded in breaking me. I was broken in body, soul and spirit. My natural elasticity was crushed, my intellect languished, the disposi- to read departed, the cheerful spark that lingered about my eye died; the dark night of slavery closed in upon me; and behold a man transformed into a brute."

"For my part, I should prefer death to hopeless bondage."

West, H.A. printed in The Scroll, April, 1927.

"A great legal victory has recently been won by our race in Texas. The Supreme has declared unconstitutional the law that kept them from the polls. The victory means much more because it was supported throughout by the Negro. Determination and fight made this important decision possible, not forums and discussion groups. If you are entitled to something and do not get it, demand it and back up this demand. We have always had big politicians in Georgia, and we are looking to them to do something besides have committee meetings."

snow on the ground, by which I suffered very much. I had determined at last to speak to him to sell me to some person in the neighborhood, so that I might still be near my wife and children—but a different fate awaited me.

My master kept a store at a small village on the bank of the Patuxent river, called B——, although he resided at some distance on a farm. One morning he rose early, and ordered me to take a yoke of oxen and go to the village, to bring home a cart which was there, saying he would follow me. He arrived at the village soon after I did, and took his breakfast with his store-keeper. He then told me to come into the house and get my breakfast. Whilst I was eating in the kitchen, I observed him talking earnestly, but low, to a stranger near the kitchen door. I soon after went out, and hitched my oxen to the cart, and was about to drive off, when several men came round about me, and amongst them the stranger whom I had seen speaking with my master. This man came up to me, and, seizing me by the collar, shook me violently, saying I was his property, and must go with him to Georgia. At the sound of these words, the thoughts of my wife and children rushed across my mind, and my heart beat away within me. I saw and knew that my case was hopeless, and that resistance was vain, as there were near twenty persons present, all of whom were ready to assist the man by whom I was kidnapped. I felt incapable of weeping or speaking, and in my despair I laughed loudly. My purchaser ordered me to cross my hands behind, which were quickly bound with a strong cord; and he then told me that we must set out that very day for the South. I asked if I could not be allowed to go to see my wife and children, or if this could not be permitted, if they might not have leave to come to see me; but was told that I would be able to get another wife in Georgia.

My new master, whose name I did not hear, took me that same day across the Patuxent, where I joined fifty-one other slaves, whom he had bought in Maryland. Thirty-two of these were men, and nineteen were women. The women were merely tied together with a rope, about the size of a bed-cord, which was tied like a halter round the neck of each; but the men, of whom I was the stoutest and strongest, were very differently caparisoned. A strong iron collar was closely fitted by means of a padlock round each of our necks. A chain of iron, about a hundred feet in length, was passed through the hasp of each padlock, except at the two ends, where the hasps of the padlock passed through a link of the chain. In addition to this, we were handcuffed in pairs, with iron staples and bolts, with a short chain, about a foot

Sally's old mistress on the plantation had been gradually declining in health for years, and now news came that she was dead. Her slaves were divided between her brothers and their children, and Sally and her sons fell to one of the nephews, a dissipated young man, who had wasted all his property, and had been waiting impatiently for his old aunt's death, that he might receive his portion of her estate. He wanted to convert some of his share into ready money, so Isaac and Daniel and Lewis were taken and sold in Fayetteville at a public auction. Daniel was bought by a planter far up the country; Isaac, by a gentleman who lived a little way out of the town; and Lewis, poor little Lewis, his mother's darling, with his merry face and sportive ways,—a speculator from Alabama, saw him, and purchased him to go with a "lot" he had in waiting, to that seemingly distant and unknown land. Sally's grief was great at parting from Daniel, whom she might never see again, for, although not so intelligent as her older son, he had always been affectionate and obedient to her. She took leave of Isaac with more hope, for he was not to be so far removed; but when it came to

Lewis, who was immediately placed in his purchaser's traveling wagon, she was broken down with anguish. The curse of servitude was upon her, although she had married a free man. She was still a slave, and her children were slaves, and only death could free them. Her distress was increased by the rage and despair of her husband, for he was as fond a father as she was a mother. She saw the money paid down for her boy; she heard him calling good-by to her out of the cart, and, half frantic, she ran to him, and catching him in her arms, held him tightly, as if they could never be parted. He was only three years old, just learning to talk, and every hour developing some new charm in his mother's eyes. He did not understand her grief, and she would not sadden his little heart by telling him he would never see her more. Pleased at the prospect of a ride in a wagon, he laughed and danced about, unconscious of fear or sorrow. Sally gave him a little ginger-cake, saying, as she put it into his hand, "Now, Lewis, break it in two, an' give mammy a piece."

"No," said he, "did n't ye jes' gin it to me?" The poor mother burst into tears, and the child, thinking it was all because she wanted the cake, exclaimed, "Here, mammy, I will gin ye a piece," and then her husband came and took her away. With streaming eyes she watched the wagon till it disappeared, and then, as she turned homeward, if she had been familiar with the Scriptures, she would have cried out in anguish, "All Thy waves and Thy billows are gone over me."

CHAPTER IX.

THE HOME DESOLATE—THE MOTHER SOLD TOO.

The house is desolate and lone,
My precious boy, now thou art gone.
I look upon thy empty bed,
And every joy from me hast fled;
I watch to hear thee on the stair.
But all is still—thou art not there;
And then my heavy heart sinks down,
And sees the cross, but not the crown.

I should be glad, my boy, to die
Beneath this Carolina sky;
Yet oft I fear my fate will be
O'er hill and plain to follow thee.
God help me! help us every one,
Through the dear love of Christ his Son!

It was almost dark when Sally reached her own door. Her husband had left her on the way, and gone into a low drinking saloon, to drown his grief and anger in intoxication. Some of her neighbors and acquaintances were waiting for her return, and, going into the house with her, tried to cheer her heart. But what can comfort a mother when she is bereft of her children? If your three only boys should be stolen from you in one day, without hope of recovery, could any earthly friend console you? Sally's sons were as much to her as yours are to you, and the words of her visitors fell unheeded upon her ear. At length, seeing that their efforts were of no avail, they went out silently, and she was left alone. Alone! Yes, it was such loneliness as only they can understand, who have had a similar trial. For a while, she sat immovable, and, as if stupefied by her grief, and then she arose, and opening her little bureau, began to look over the clothes that had belonged to Lewis; every article of which she had labored hard to procure, and had fitted and made for him with a mother's pride and pleasure. The little frocks and aprons were taken up and laid aside again,

"I live down in Alabama."

"Oh, then," said Sally, "I couldn't cry. 'Peared like I was stunned, an' the life died out o' me. I did jes' as he told me without sayin' a word. 'You must come along now,' said he, 'and I'll see about your things afterward.' So he took hold o' my arm an' led me to the door, an' I walked along with him like I was in a dream, till we got to de slave-pen, an' den he pushed me in, an' locked me up wid de rest."

CHAPTER X.

THE SLAVE-PEN.

It is not dying that I fear;
  Lord! it were sweet to die,
And safe from all that wounds me here,
  Within thine arms to lie.

But O! 'tis living that I dread,
  When friends and love are gone,
And not a star is overhead
  To shine my night upon.

And yet, if thou would'st have me live,
  My Master and my Friend,
Unmurmuring days to Thee I'll give,
  For thou the cross dost send.

As the door closed upon her purchaser, and the terrible reality of her fate burst upon her, Sally's unnatural calmness deserted her, and she sank to the ground in a swoon. The slave-pen was an enclosure of perhaps a hundred feet square, surrounded by a high board fence, and entered by a small gate or door. In it, some thirty men, women, and children—the men chained together, two by two—were waiting their departure to the far south-west. A dreadful scene it was. Some were cursing and swearing, and some were rending the air with their cries. There were wives torn from their husbands, and husbands from their wives, and children snatched from their parents, and parents bereft of their children. Without, many of their friends and acquaintances were gathered, talking to them through the bars, some in anger and some in grief, which could find no words for its expression. There were two speculators in company; Sally's purchaser, who attended to outside matters, and who was naturally a kind-hearted man, and another, who was wholly sordid and unfeeling and whose business it was to stay with the slaves, and to act as overseer, keeping them in order as he saw fit. He walked among them, flourishing a whip in his hand, listening to their conversation, and watching narrowly any seeming attempt to escape.

It was a bright day in June, and the country was in its summer prime. All about them were cultivated fields, and away in the distance the dark pine forests stretched to the horizon. The boughs were full of singing birds, and every breeze was odorous of roses and jessamines, but in that little spot there was anguish enough to shade the brightness of the world, and to make all the angels weep as they looked down out of the clear heaven!

In the loud talking and confusion of the place, Sally's entrance was not noticed. She had lain for some time unconscious, when the overseer observed her, and brandishing his whip about her head, giving her at the same time a slight kick with his heavy foot, he called out, in a rough voice—

"Come, wake up, old gal! Don't want no fainting fits here; all my folks must be lively."

So rudely roused, Sally made an effort to sit up and look about her, and as she did so, he turned away, and was soon occupied in the distant corner. Poor Sally, her heart sickened at the scene before her, and she bowed her head upon her hands. Now and then some fearful oath came to her ear, and anon a piteous exclamation. She thought over all her life, from her childhood to this bitterest hour; a gloomy reach, with only here and there an illumined portion, like a November's day in northern latitudes, when black clouds hurry across the sky, and sunny gleams appear only now and then between the shadows of the howling winds. Would the night never come? She longed for death, and if, in her woeful state, she could have prayed, she would have besought the Lord that it might not tarry. She was roused from her reverie by the entrance of her purchaser. Seeing her sitting motionless where he had left her, he exclaimed, "Come, Sally, there 's no use in grieving—what 's done can 't be helped. I 'll take you back to the house now to pick up your things."

At these words, all the realities of her situation came vividly to her mind. She thought of her husband and of Isaac, and of her old mother, who was now owned by a gentleman a little way out of the town, and with a "Yes, mas'r," she arose and followed him. On through the streets they passed, and by the very market where she had that morning made her purchases with so much of independence and satisfaction. What a change had a few hours wrought. Now she was weak and dizzy, and led by a man who had over her absolute control. The real reason of her sale was that her success and popularity had awakened so much envy and jealousy, that it was deemed expedient she should be removed. Alabama was then what Texas is now. Her peace and comfort were nothing compared to the safety of the cherished institution of slavery, and so they were sacrificed without one pang of remorse, as they have been thousands of times since her day. She was well known in Fayetteville, and the rumor of her sale spread rapidly through the town. As they passed on, such remarks as this fell upon her ear:

"Good enough for her."

"Yes, yes; she 's held her head rather too high."

"Ah! that 's the way to take down your smart niggers. Reckon she wont be quite so much of a lady down in the Alabama clearings."

But they were not all ill-natured remarks which she heard. In one group was a poor white woman with whom she had often shared her simple meal, and who was now protesting against her fate.

"I tell you it's a mean shame. There aint a better woman in Fayetteville, white or black. Did n't she help me take care of Jimmy all through the fever last fall, and bring me a cup of coffee and a bit of bread whenever he was too sick for me to go to my day's work? I say we'd any of us better be sold than Sally. Any how, I believe she's got the Lord on her side."

These kind words touched Sally's heart, and for the first time that day the tears came to her eyes. Was the Lord on her side? In the depths of her heart she prayed that He would not desert her in this most desperate hour. "Oh! Mas'r," she cried, when she could speak, "I's willin' to go with ye if it's de Lord's will, but I'se got a son, my oldest chile, out on de Ridgely plantation, an' a little ways from him my ole mother, an' her I haint seen dis three years—if I could only bid 'em good bye!"

"Well, Sally, if you 'll be peaceable and not make me any trouble, I'll send for 'em to come and see you to-morrow morning."

"Thank'ee, Mas'r," was her grateful reply.

When she reached her own house, how deserted did everything already look. The landlord had been there, and taken her newly-purchased barrel of flour for rent; the young girl who assisted her had fled in affright, and the rooms were in confusion. The speculator kept guard at the door, and called out to her to make haste and get ready her things. How hard it would have been to her to leave the various articles of household and personal comfort, which by hard labor she had gathered together, if her thoughts had not been engrossed by greater sorrows. Only a limited amount of baggage could be carried on the long journey, and Sally was restricted to one trunk and a bag, a bed and a tub and a pail. The three last were speedily put in readiness, and then she prepared to fill the trunk and the bag with her clothing. One thing after another was taken from the drawers and folded away, and when she came to Isaac's Bible, she placed it in the bag, that she might give it to him on the morrow. While thus employed, her husband suddenly entered the house. He was away at his work when the news of her sale reached him, and, almost beside himself, he had hurried home to see her once more. Superior to him in thought and energy, he regarded her with a kind of veneration, and was weak as a child at the thought of losing her.

"Oh, Sally, ye shan't go. I can't live without ye. I'll tell dat ar cursed speculator to"——

"Don't go on so, Lewis, I can't bar it; I specs it's de Lord dat sends him."

"Sally, ye know I's got some money dat I's been savin', an' I know where there's them that 'll lend me some more. I'll buy ye of him;" and he went to the door and offered the man two hundred and fifty dollars, the price he had paid for his wife; and when this was refused, three hundred dollars was proffered, with the promise that the money should be paid to him that very evening.

"There's no use talking about it," said the speculator, "money can't alter this transaction. Sally's going to Alabama, and you may as well be quiet about it."

"Oh, Lord Jesus!" gasped Sally, as the words reached her through the open door, "go thar with me!"

Half frantic, her husband came back, and now raving, and now embracing her, he watched her lay the last things into the trunk upon the floor. "What do ye carry yer clothes for, Sally? He'll sell 'em to get grain for his cursed horses. I would n't take any thing but what I had on my back."

At this moment the speculator called out to know if Sally was ready, and hastily fastening the trunk, and leaving it with the other things which were to be conveyed to the wagon, and taking the bag in her hand, she went out, saying to her husband, "Bar it as well 's ye ken, Lewis, an' cum an' see me in de mornin'."

Eve was not sadder at leaving Paradise than was Sally when she stepped, for the last time, over the threshold of that humble dwelling, where had passed the only bright days she had ever known. Twilight was fast fading, and the hush of a tranquil summer night was settling upon the town. Who could have thought so much of anguish was in human hearts on such an eve! Silently they walked on, Sally and her master. At the corner of one of the streets she was accosted by a colored man named White, who had always been very friendly to her. Just as he passed her he said, in a low tone, which was unheard by her companion, "I shall come up to de yard to see ye in de evenin'." When they reached the slave-pen, it was quite dark, but out by the wagons a huge fire was burning, and its ruddy glow shone even on the faces of the poor creatures within the enclosure. Most of them were sleeping, worn out with the misery of the day. Sally took the most quiet corner, and laying her bag down against the fence, had composed herself as well as she was able, when she heard some one speaking to her through the bars. It was White. He had come to tell her that the speculators, having locked the door, had gone away for a little while, and that if she would wait till they were all asleep, and the fire had burnt low, she could climb over the fence and escape. A wild hope of freedom sprung up within her, and she embraced it as eagerly as an imprisoned bird that had beat its wings hopelessly against unyielding walls, would fly to an open window which revealed the sunny sky. Carefully she took the clothes from her bag and passed them, piece by piece, through the crack to her friend without, and then, when all was quiet, and the firelight glow had faded, she tried to mount the high fence that she might let herself down upon the other side. A difficult thing it was. Two or three times she almost succeeded, and then fell frightened back upon the ground. Just as she was about to attempt it again, in a different manner, the bolt of the door was suddenly withdrawn, and she knew that the master had returned, and that all was over. So quietly she lay down, and closing her eyes as if in sleep, resigned herself to her fate.

The morning dawned bright and beautiful on the fields, and wan and wretched on that imprisoned band. The slave train was to leave before noon, and life-long leave-takings must be crowded into these brief hours. Only a favored few were permitted to enter the yard; most of the poor creatures were standing by the fence, talking through it to their friends without, strangely intermingling oaths and sobs and loving words. Here and there one was heard calling upon God, and committing a friend to His care, but most of them seemed desperate and reckless in their woe.

Sally stood, looking out between the boards, to see if, among the multitude, she could discern her mother or her child. The sun rose high in heaven, and the dew forsook the grass, but still they did not come. She began to fear they had not been sent for, when, hastening through the crowd, she saw a tall and comely boy leading an old woman by the hand, whom she knew to be her son and her mother.

Calling to them that they might know where to find her, she sat down by the largest opening in the boards, and gazed out upon them as if all of life were in her eyes. Her old mother was growing childish, and her heart was almost broken at parting from Sally, who was her only daughter and her pride. Her screams and groans were agonizing to hear, and pierced poor Sally's heart with a keener sorrow. Isaac seemed quite stunned and silenced by the blow, but deep thoughts were at work within him, and he was forming resolutions which were to influence his future life. Among the slave company was a young girl of good disposition and character, named Charlotte Rives. The grandmother knew her, and begged Sally, as she desired the blessing of the Lord, to watch over and protect her. While they stood thus talking, Sally's husband made his way to the group, with wild, sad face, that betrayed a night of pain. He gave her a small parcel, saying, "There's a new dress for ye, Sally. When ye get to Alabama, if ye think it 'll do for me to come, find somebody to write to me, an' I 'll surely go to ye."

"I will, Lewis, I will. I 'll pray to de Lord to let ye come."

"Sally, I can't stay to see ye go. It would kill me. If ye hear any thing from little Lewis, send it to me in de letter. Farwell!"

"Oh, God o' mercy, farwell, farwell!" said Sally, as they wrung each other's hands, and parted.

There was a great commotion now about the yard; then the door was opened, and the speculators entered, and took out first the chained men, whom they arranged in marching order, and then the women and children followed. Last of all came Sally, and as soon as she was without the door, her mother and her son clasped her in their arms. White, upon some pretext, had brought her bag to her again, and now, drawing from it the precious Bible, she put it into Isaac's hand, saying—

"Read it every day, chile, an' pray to de Lord to guide ye. 'Pears like he 'll take care of ye. If ye see yer brother Daniel, tell him his mother loves him, an' wants him allers to be a good boy."

"Oh, mother," said she to the old woman, "you'se been a good mother to me, an I can't half thank ye for it. Do n't take on for me. De Lord 'll bless ye, an' bring us all together, I hopes, in de Kingdom."

Around Sally stood many of her acquaintances, who had been accustomed to attend the same meeting with her, and who prized her friendship, and had come out from Fayetteville to bid her adieu. Some were weeping, some invoking God's blessing upon her, and one was improvizing, in a minor strain, a song which began—

"Sister, far'well! I bid ye adieu,
I'm sorry to leave ye, I lub ye so well;
But now you are going to whar I dunno;
When ye get to yer station, pray for poor me!"

But now the train was ready, and the impatient overseer called out to Sally, "Come, hurry up there! You 'll have time enough to cry on the road." One last embrace, and the mother and daughter and son tore themselves from each other's arms, casting back agonized glances as they moved away. Suddenly, the old woman broke from her grandchild's hold, and running after her daughter, untied her checked apron from her waist, and threw it toward her, asking her own in exchange, which was given. Simple pledge! yet was it as dear to them as if it had been a girdle of gems.

"Far'well, far'well, the Lord bless ye," they cried, till their voices grew faint in the distance, and then the grandmother and the boy returned to their respective masters, and Sally went forward to unknown lands.

CHAPTER XI.

THE SLAVE-GANG.

Over its bed the river rolled,
All flecked with shining foam;
The waves were black and the waves were cold,
But, deep in their darkest, chilliest fold,
I would I had found a home.

Oh, it had been a sweet release,
Secure from a master's call,
There to sleep in unbroken peace,
Till the world and the worldling's power should cease,
And the Lord be all in all!

In the slave-coffle were about twenty men, with three women — Sally, the young girl Charlotte, and an old woman named Hagar, whom the speculator had bought at a bargain, and five small children. The men were chained together, two by two, but Hagar was docile from age and habit, and Charlotte from youth and inexperience, and there was a kind of dignity about Sally which made her new master dislike to put her in irons; so that, contrary to the usual custom, all three were left unshackled. The speculators rode in a light carriage, and a large wagon, drawn by horses, contained the baggage of the com-not black; and, being a slave, my masters and mistresses would not admit that I was white. So I reached the age of ten, still called "a child," and actually one in all life's experiences, though pretty well advanced in education. I had a very good knowledge of the rudiments, had bestowed some attention upon Grammar, and eagerly read every book that fell in my way. Love of study taught me seclusive habits; I read long and late; and the desire of a finished education became the passion of my life. Alas! these days were but a poor preparation for the life that was to come after!

Miss Betsy, though a warm-hearted woman, was a violent advocate of slavery. I have since been puzzled how to reconcile this with her otherwise Christian character; and, though she professed to love me dearly, and had bestowed so much attention upon the cultivation of my mind, and expressed it as her opinion that I was too pretty and white to be a slave, yet, if any one had spoken of giving me freedom, she would have condemned it as domestic heresy. If I had belonged to her, I doubt not but my life would have been a happy one. But, alas! a different lot was assigned me!

About two years and six months after my old master's death, a division was made of the property. This involved a sale of everything, even the household furniture. There were, I believe, heavy debts hanging over the estate. These must be met, and the residue divided among the heirs.

When it was made known in the kitchen that a sale was to be made, the slaves were panic-stricken. Loud cries and lamentations arose, and my young mistresses came often to the kitchen to comfort us.

One of these young ladies, Miss Margaret, a tall, nobly-formed girl, with big blue eyes and brown hair, frequently came and sat with us, trying, in the most persuasive tones, to reconcile the old ones to their destiny. Often did I see the large tears roll down her fair cheeks, and her red lip quiver. These indications of sympathy, coming from such a lovely being, cheered many an hour of after-captivity.

But the "sale-day" came at last; I have a confused idea of it. The ladies left the day before. Miss Betsy took an affectionate leave of me; ah, I did not then know that it was a final one.

The servants were all sold, as I heard one man say, at very high rates, though not under the auctioneer's hammer. To that my young masters were opposed.

A tall, hard-looking man came up to me, very roughly seized my arm, bade me open my mouth; examined my teeth; felt of my limbs; made me run a few yards; ordered me to jump; and, being well satisfied with my activity, said to Master Edward, "I will take her." Little comprehending the full meaning of that brief sentence, I rejoined the group of children from which I had been summoned. After awhile, my mother came up to me, holding a wallet in her hand. The tear-drops stood on her cheeks, and her whole frame was distorted with pain. She walked toward me a few steps, then stopped, and suddenly shaking her head, exclaimed, "No, no, I can't do it, I can't do it." I was amazed at her grief, but an indefinable fear kept me from rushing to her.

"Here, Kitty," she said to an old negro woman, who stood near, "you break it to her. I can't do it. No, it will drive me mad. Oh, heaven! that I was ever born to see this day." Then rocking her body back and forward in a transport of agony, she gave full vent to her feelings in a long, loud, piteous wail. Oh, God! that cry of grief, that knell of a breaking heart, rang in my ears for many long and painful days. At length Aunt Kitty approached me, and, laying her hand on my shoulder, kindly said:

"Alas, poor chile, you mus' place your trus' in the good God above, you mus' look to Him for help; you are gwine to leave your mother now. You are to have a new home, a new master, and I hope new friends. May the Lord be with you." So saying, she broke suddenly away from me; but I saw that her wrinkled face was wet with tears.

With perhaps an idle, listless air, I received this astounding news; but a whirlwind was gathering in my breast. What could she mean by new friends and a new home? Surely I was to take my mother with me! No mortal power would dare to sever us. Why, I remember that when master sold the gray mare, the colt went also. Who could, who would, who dared, separate the parent from her offspring? Alas! I had yet to learn that the white man dared do all that his avarice might suggest; and there was no human tribunal where the outcast African could pray for "right!" Ah, when I now think of my poor mother's form, as it swayed like a willow in the tempest of grief; when I remember her bitter cries, and see her arms thrown franticly toward me, and hear her earnest—oh, how earnest—prayer for death or madness, then I wonder where were Heaven's thunderbolts; but retributive Justice will come sooner or later, and He who remembers mercy now will not forget justice then.

"Come along, gal, come along, gather up your duds, and come with me," said a harsh voice; and, looking up from my bewildered reverie, I beheld the man who had so carefully examined me. I was too much startled to fully understand the words, and stood vacantly gazing at him. This strange manner he construed into disrespect; and, raising his riding-whip, he brought it down with considerable force upon my back. It was the first lash I had ever given to me in anger. I smarted beneath the stripe, and a cry of pain broke from my lips. Mother sprang to me, and clasping my quivering form in her arms, cried out to my young master, "Oh, Master Eddy, have mercy on me, on my child. I have served you faithfully, I nursed you, I grew up with your poor mother, who now sleeps in the cold ground I beg you now to save my child," and she sank down at his feet, whilst her tears fell fast.

Then my poor old grandfather, who was called the patriarch slave, being the eldest one of the race in the whole neighborhood, joined us. His gray head, wrinkled face, and bent form, told of many a year of hard servitude.

"What is it, Massa Ed, what is it Kaisy be takin' on so 'bout? you haint driv the chile off? No—no! young massa only playin' trick now; come Kais' don't be makin' fool of yourself, young massa not gwine to separate you and the chile."

These words seemed to reanimate my mother, and she looked up at Master Edward with a grateful expression of face, whilst she clasped her arms tightly around his knees, exclaiming, "Oh, bless you, young master, bless you forever, and forgive poor Kaisy for distrusting you, but Pompey told me the child was sold away from me, and that gemman struck her;" and here again she sobbed, and caught hold of me convulsively, as if she feared I might be taken.

I looked at my young master's face, and the ghastly whiteness which overspread it, the tearful glister of his eye, and the strange tremor of his figure, struck me with fright. I knew my doom. Young as I was, my first dread was for my mother; I forgot my own perilous situation, and mourned alone for her. I would have given worlds could insensibility have been granted her.

"I've got no time to be foolin' longer with these niggers, come 'long, gal. Ann, I believe, you tole me was her name," he said, as he turned to Master Edward. Another wild shriek from my mother, a deep sigh from grandpap, and I looked at master Ed, who was striking his forehead vehemently, and the tears were trickling down his cheeks.

"Here, Mr. Peterkin, here!" exclaimed Master Edward, "here is your bill of sale; I will refund your money; release me from my contract."

Peterkin cast on him one contemptuous look, and with a low, chuckling laugh, replied, "No; you must stand to your bargain. I want that gal; she is likely, and it will do me good to thrash the devil out of her;" turning to me he added, "quit your snuffling and snubbing, or I'll give you something to cry 'bout;" and, roughly catching me by the arm, he hurried me off, despite the entreaty of Master Ed, the cries of mother, and the feeble supplication of my grandfather. I dared to cast one look behind, and beheld my mother wallowing in the dust, whilst her frantic cries of "save my child, save my child!" rang with fearful agony in my ears. Master Ed covered his face with his hands, and old grandfather reverently raised his to Heaven, as if beseeching mercy. The sight of this anguish-stricken group filled me with a new sense of horror, and forgetful of the presence of Peterkin, I burst into tears: but I was quickly recalled by a fierce and stinging blow from his stout riding-whip.

"See here, nigger (this man, raised among negroes, used their dialect), if you dar' to give another whimper, I'll beat the very life out 'en yer." This terrific threat seemed to scare away every thought of precaution; and, by a sudden and agile bound, I broke loose from him and darted off to the sad group, from which I had been so ruthlessly torn, and, sinking down before Master Ed, I cried out in a wild, despairing tone, "Save me, good master, save me—kill me, or hide me from that awful man, he'll kill me;" and, seizing hold of the skirt of his coat, I covered my face with it to shut out the sight of Peterkin, whose red eye-balls were glaring with fury upon me. Oath after oath escaped his lips. Mother saw him rapidly approaching to recapture me, and, with the noble, maternal instinct of self-sacrifice, sprang forward only to receive the heavy blow of his uplifted whip. She reeled, tottered and sank stunned upon the ground.

"Thar, take that, you yaller hussy, and cuss yer nigger hide for daring to raise this rumpus here," he said, as he rapidly strode past her.

"Gently, Mr. Peterkin," exclaimed Master Edward, "let me speak to her; a little encouragement is better than force."

"This is my encouragement for them," and he shook his whip.

Unheeding him, Master Edward turned to me, saying, "Ann, come now, be a good girl, go with this gentleman, and be an obedient girl; he will give you a kind, nice home; sometimes he will let you come to see your mother. Here is some money for you to buy a pretty head-handkerchief; now go with him."

These kind words and encouraging tones, brought a fresh gush of tears to my eyes. Taking the half-dollar which he offered me, and reverently kissing the skirt of his coat, I rejoined Peterkin; one look at his cold, harsh face, chilled my resolution; yet I had resolved to go without another word of complaint. I could not suppress a groan when I passed the spot where my mother lay still insensible from the effects of the blow

One by one the servants, old and young, gave me a hearty shake of the hand as I passed the place where they were standing in a row for the inspection of buyers.

I had nerved myself, and now that the parting from mother was over, I felt that the bitterness of death was past, and I could meet anything. Nothing now could be a trial, yet I was touched when the servants offered me little mementoes and keepsakes. One gave a yard of ribbon, another a half-paper of pins, a third presented a painted cotton head-tie; others gave me ginger-cakes, candies, or small coins. Out of their little they gave abundantly, and, small as were the bestowments, I well knew that they had made sacrifices to give even so much. I was too deeply affected to make any other acknowledgment than a nod of the head; for a choking thickness was gathering in my throat, and a blinding mist obscured my sight. I did not see my young mistresses, for they had left the house, declaring they could not bear to witness a spectacle so revolting to their feelings.

Upon reaching the gate I observed a red-painted wagon, with an awning of domestic cotton. Standing near it, and holding the horses, was an old, worn, scarred, weather-beaten negro man, who instantly took off his hat as Mr. Peterkin approached.

"Well, Nace, you see I've bought this wench to-day," and he shook his whip over my head.

"Ya! ya! Massa, but she ha' got one goot home wid yer."

"Yes, has she, Nace; but don't yer think the slut has been cryin' 'bout it!"

"Lor' bless us, Massa, but a little of the beech-tree will fetch opes the fair petals of the lily; and I longed for the summer warmth of kindness to bid it come forth and bloom in beauty.

But now I turned away from her, murmuring, "'Tis not the time." She would not open her heart, and my own must likewise be closed and silent; but when I met poor little Amy, looking so neglected, with scarcely apparel sufficient to cover her nudity, my heart failed me utterly. There she held upon her hip little Ben, her only joy; every now and then she addressed some admonitory words to him, such as "Hush, baby, love," "you's my baby," "sissy loves it," and similar expressions of coaxing and endearment. And this, her only comfort, was about to be wrenched from her. The only link of love that bound her to a weary existence, was to be severed by the harsh mandate of another. Just God! is this right? Oh, my soul, be thou still! Look on in patience! The cloud deepens above! The day of God's wrath is at hand! They who have coldly forbidden our indulging the sweet humanities of life, who have destroyed every social relation, severed kith and kin, ruptured the ties of blood, and left us more lonely than the beasts of the forest, may tremble when the avenger comes!

I ventured to speak with Amy, and I employed the kindest tone; but ever and anon little Ben would send forth such a piteous wail, that I feared he was in physical pain. Amy, however, very earnestly assured me that she had administered catnip tea in plentiful quantities, and had examined his person very carefully to discover if a pin or needle had punctured his flesh; but everything seemed perfectly right.

I attempted to take him in my arms; but he clung so vigorously to Amy's shoulder, that it required strength to unfasten his grasp.

"Oh, don'tee take him; he doesn't like fur to leab me. Him usen to me," cried Amy, as in a motherly way she caressed him. "Now, pretty little boy donee cry any more. Ann shan't hab you;—now be a good nice boy;" and thus she expended upon him her whole vocabulary of endearing epithets.

"Who could," I asked myself, "have the heart to untie this sweet fraternal bond? Who could dry up the only fountain in this benighted soul? Oh, I have often marvelled how the white mother, who knows, in such perfection, the binding beauty of maternal love, can look unsympathizingly on, and see the poor black parent torn away from her children. I once saw a white lady, of conceded refinement, sitting in the portico of her own house, with her youngest born, a babe of some seven months, dallying on her knee, and she toying with the pretty gold-threads of its silken hair, whilst her husband was in the kitchen, with a whip in his hand, severely lashing a negro woman, whom he had sold to a trader—lashing her because she refused to go cheerfully and leave her infant behind. The poor wretch, as a last resource, fled to her Mistress, and, on her knees, begged her to have her child. "Oh, Mistress," cried the frantic black woman, "ask Master to let me take my baby with me." What think you was the answer of this white mother?

"Go away, you impudent wretch, you don't deserve to have your child. It will be better off away from you!" Aye, this was the answer which, accompanied by a derisive sneer, she gave to the heart-stricken black mother. Thus she felt, spoke, and acted, even whilst caressing her own helpless infant! Who would think it injustice to "commend the poison-chalice to her own lips"? She, this fine lady, was known to weep violently, because an Irish woman was unable to save a sufficiency of money from her earnings to bring her son from Ireland to America; but, for the African mother, who was parting eternally from her helpless babe, she had not so much as a consolatory word. Oh, ye of the proud Caucasian race, would that your hearts were as fair and spotless as your complexions! Truly can the Saviour say of you, "Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, I would have gathered you together as a hen gathereth her chickens, but ye would not!" Oh, perverse generation of vipers, how long will you abuse the Divine forbearance!

was about four years old. My mother had several children, and they were sold upon master's death to separate purchasers. She was sold, my father told me, to a Georgia trader. I, of all her children, was the only one left in Maryland. When sold I was naked, never having had on clothes in my life, but my new master gave me a child's frock, belonging to one of his own children. After he had purchased me, he dressed me in this garment, took me before him on his horse, and started home; but my poor mother, when she saw me leaving her for the last time, ran after me, took me down from the horse, clasped me in her arms, and wept loudly and bitterly over me. My master seemed to pity her, and endeavored to soothe her distress by telling her that he would be a good master to me, and that I should not want anything. She then, still holding me in her arms, walked along the road beside the horse as he moved slowly, and earnestly and imploringly besought my master to buy her and the rest of her children, and not permit them to be carried away by the negro buyers; but whilst thus entreating him to save her and her family, the slave-driver, who had first bought her, came running in pursuit of her with a raw-hide in his hand. When he overtook us, he told her he was her master now, and ordered her to give that little negro to its owner, and come back with him.

My mother then turned to him and cried, "Oh, master, do not take me from my child!" Without making any reply, he gave her two or three heavy blows on the shoulders with his raw-hide, snatched me from her arms, handed me to my master, and seizing her by one arm, dragged her back towards the place of sale. My master then quickened the pace of his horse; and as we advanced, the cries of my poor parent became more and more indistinct—at length they died away in the distance, and I never again heard the voice of my poor mother. Young as I was, the horrors of that day sank deeply into my heart, and even at this time, though half a century has elapsed, the terrors of the scene return with painful vividness upon my memory. Frightened at the sight of the cruelties inflicted upon my poor mother, I forgot my own sorrows at parting from her and clung to my new master, as an angel and a saviour, when compared with the hardened fiend into whose power she had fallen. She had been a kind and good mother to me; had warmed me in her bosom in the cold nights of winter; and had often divided the scanty pittance of food allowed her by her mistress, between my brothers, and sisters, and me, and gone supperless to bed herself. Whatever victuals she could obtain beyond the coarse food, salt fish and corn bread, allowed to slaves on the Patuxent and Potomac rivers, she carefully distributed made ready my bundle, she bade me good-by with tears in her eyes, saying: "My son, be a good boy; be polite to every one, and always behave yourself properly." It was sad to her to part with me, though she did not know that she was never to see me again, for my master had said nothing to her regarding his purpose and she only thought, as I did, that I was hired to work on the canal-boat, and that she should see me occasionally. But alas! We never met again. I can see her form still as when she bade me good-bye. That parting I can never forget. I ran off from her as quickly as I could after her parting words, for I did not want her to see me crying. I went to my master at the store, and he again told me that he had hired me to work on the canal-boat, and to go aboard immediately. Of the boat and the trip and the scenes along the route I remember little—I only thought of my mother and my leaving her.

When we arrived at Richmond, George Pullan, a "nigger-trader," as he was called, came to the boat and began to question me, asking me first if I could remember having had the chickenpox, measles or whooping-cough. I answered, yes. Then he asked me if I did not want to take a little walk with him.

I said, no. "Well," said he, "you have got to go. Your master sent you down here to be sold, and told me to come and get you and take you to the trader's yard, ready to be sold." I saw that to hesitate was useless; so I at once obeyed him and went.

A SLAVE MARKET.

The trader's establishment consisted of an office, a large show-room and a yard in the rear enclosed with a wall of brick fifteen feet high. The principal men of the establishment were the proprietor and the foreman. When slaves were to be exhibited for sale, the foreman was called to the office by means of a bell, and an order given him to bring into the show-room all the slaves in the establishment. This was the work of but a few minutes, and the women were placed in a row on one side of the room and the men on the other. Persons desirous of purchasing them passed up and down between the lines looking the poor creatures over, and questioning them in about the following manner: "What can you do?" "Are you a good cook? seamstress? dairymaid?"—this to the women, while the men would be questioned as to their line of work: "Can you plow? Are you a blacksmith? Have you ever cared for horses? Can place of both housekeeper and waiting maid to her mistress. She was, in fact, at the beginning and end of every thing.

Mrs. Flint, like many southern women, was totally deficient in energy. She had not strength to superintend her household affairs; but her nerves were so strong, that she could sit in her easy chair and see a woman whipped, till the blood trickled from every stroke of the lash. She was a member of the church; but partaking of the Lord's supper did not seem to put her in a Christian frame of mind. If dinner was not served at the exact time on that particular Sunday, she would station herself in the kitchen, and wait till it was dished, and then spit in all the kettles and pans that had been used for cooking. She did this to prevent the cook and her children from eking out their meagre fare with the remains of the gravy and other scrapings. The slaves could get nothing to eat except what she chose to give them. Provisions were weighed out by the pound and ounce, three times a day. I can assure you she gave them no chance to eat wheat bread from her flour barrel. She knew how many biscuits a quart of flour would make, and exactly what size they ought to be.

Dr. Flint was an epicure. The cook never sent a dinner to his table without fear and trembling; for if there happened to be a dish not to his liking, he would either order her to be whipped, or compel her to eat every mouthful of it in his presence. The poor, hungry creature might not have objected to eating it; but she did object to having her master cram it down her throat till she choked.

They had a pet dog, that was a nuisance in the house.

The cook was ordered to make some Indian mush for him. He refused to eat, and when his head was held over it, the froth flowed from his mouth into the basin. He died a few minutes after. When Dr. Flint came in, he said the mush had not been well cooked, and that was the reason the animal would not eat it. He sent for the cook, and compelled her to eat it. He thought that the woman's stomach was stronger than the dog's; but her sufferings afterwards proved that he was mistaken. This poor woman endured many cruelties from her master and mistress; sometimes she was locked up, away from her nursing baby, for a whole day and night.

When I had been in the family a few weeks, one of the plantation slaves was brought to town, by order of his master. It was near night when he arrived, and Dr. Flint ordered him to be taken to the work house, and tied up to the joist, so that his feet would just escape the ground. In that situation he was to wait till the doctor had taken his tea. I shall never forget that night. Never before, in my life, had I heard hundreds of blows fall, in succession, on a human being. His piteous groans, and his "O, pray don't, massa," rang in my ear for months afterwards. There were many conjectures as to the cause of this terrible punishment. Some said master accused him of stealing corn; others said the slave had quarrelled with his wife, in presence of the overseer, and had accused his master of being the father of her child. They were both black, and the child was very fair.

I went into the work house next morning, and saw the cowhide still wet with blood, and the boards all covered with gore. The poor man lived, and continued to quarrel with his wife. A few months afterwards Dr. Flint handed them both over to a slave-trader. The guilty man put their value into his pocket, and had the satisfaction of knowing that they were out of sight and hearing. When the mother was delivered into the trader's hands, she said, "You promised to treat me well." To which he replied, "You have let your tongue run too far; damn you!" She had forgotten that it was a crime for a slave to tell who was the father of her child.

From others than the master persecution also comes in such cases. I once saw a young slave girl dying soon after the birth of a child nearly white. In her agony she cried out, "O Lord, come and take me!" Her mistress stood by, and mocked at her like an incarnate fiend. "You suffer, do you?" she exclaimed. "I am glad of it. You deserve it all, and more too."

The girl's mother said, "The baby is dead, thank God; and I hope my poor child will soon be in heaven, too."

"Heaven!" retorted the mistress. "There is no such place for the like of her and her bastard."

The poor mother turned away, sobbing. Her dying daughter called her, feebly, and as she bent over her, I heard her say, "Don't grieve so, mother; God knows all about it; and HE will have mercy upon me."

Her sufferings, afterwards, became so intense, that her mistress felt unable to stay; but when she left the room, the scornful smile was still on her lips. Seven children called her mother. The poor black woman had but the one child, whose eyes she saw closing in death, while she thanked God for taking her away from the greater bitterness of life.

III.

THE SLAVES' NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Dr. Flint owned a fine residence in town, several farms, and about fifty slaves, besides hiring a number by the year.

Hiring-day at the south takes place on the 1st of January. On the 2d, the slaves are expected to go to their new masters. On a farm, they work until the corn and cotton are laid. They then have two holidays. Some masters give them a good dinner under the trees. This over, they work until Christmas eve. If no heavy charges are meantime brought against them, they are given four or five holidays, whichever the master or overseer may think proper. Then comes New Year's eve; and they gather together their little alls, or more properly speaking, their little nothings, and wait anxiously for the dawning of day. At the appointed hour the grounds are thronged with men, women, and children, waiting, like criminals, to hear their doom pronounced. The slave is sure to know who is the most humane, or cruel master, within forty miles of him.

It is easy to find out, on that day, who clothes and feeds his slaves well; for he is surrounded by a crowd, begging, "Please, massa, hire me this year. I will work very hard, massa."

If a slave is unwilling to go with his new master, he is whipped, or locked up in jail, until he consents to go, and promises not to run away during the year.

Should he chance to change his mind, thinking it justifiable to violate an extorted promise, woe unto him if he is caught! The whip is used till the blood flows at his feet; and his stiffened limbs are put in chains, to be dragged in the field for days and days!

If he lives until the next year, perhaps the same man will hire him again, without even giving him an opportunity of going to the hiring-ground. After those for hire are disposed of, those for sale are called up.

O, you happy free women, contrast your New Year's day with that of the poor bond-woman! With you it is a pleasant season, and the light of the day is blessed. Friendly wishes meet you every where, and gifts are showered upon you. Even hearts that have been estranged from you soften at this season, and lips that have been silent echo back, "I wish you a happy New Year." Children bring their little offerings, and raise their rosy lips for a caress. They are your own, and no hand but that of death can take them from you.

But to the slave mother New Year's day comes laden with peculiar sorrows. She sits on her cold cabin floor, watching the children who may all be torn from her the next morning; and often does she wish that she and they might die before the day dawns. She may be an ignorant creature, degraded by the system that has brutalized her from childhood; but she has a mother's instincts, and is capable of feeling a mother's agonies.

On one of these sale days, I saw a mother lead seven children to the auction-block. She knew that some of them would be taken from her; but they took all. The children were sold to a slave-trader, and their mother was bought by a man in her own town. Before night her children were all far away. She begged the trader to tell her where he intended to take them; this he refused to do. How could he, when he knew he would sell them, one by one, wherever he could command the highest price? I met that mother in the street, and her wild, haggard face lives to-day in my mind. She wrung her hands in anguish, and exclaimed, "Gone! All gone! Why don't God kill me?" I had no words wherewith to comfort her. Instances of this kind are of daily, yea, of hourly occurrence.

Slaveholders have a method, peculiar to their institution, of getting rid of old slaves, whose lives have been worn out in their service. I knew an old woman, who for seventy years faithfully served her master. She had become almost helpless, from hard labor and disease. Her owners moved to Alabama, and the old black woman was left to be sold to any body who would give twenty dollars for her.

in this position, all they wanted to, a pail of strong salt and water was brought, and the poor fellow was "washed down." This washing was customary, after whippings, as the planters claimed it drew out all the soreness, and healed the lacerated flesh.

Upon one occasion, the family being away, I was left extra work to do, being set to help three fellow slaves lay off the rows for planting corn. We did not get them quite straight. The deviation we made from the line was very little, and could scarcely be seen, even by an expert; but the least thing wrong about the work would cause any slave to be whipped, and so all four of us were flogged.

THE SLAVE CABIN.

There was a section of the plantation known as "the quarters," where were situated the cabins of the slaves. These cabins were built of rough logs, and daubed with the red clay or mud of the region. No attempt was made to give them a neat appearance—they were not even whitewashed. Each cabin was about fourteen feet square, containing but one room, and was covered with oak boards, three feet in length, split out of logs by hand. These boards were not nailed on, but held in their places by what were done — so many more dishes to prepare, that Delia would, perhaps, not have so much time for each meal. But there was no allowance made. It was never thought reasonable that a servant should make a mistake — things must always be the same. I was listening to this quarrel between madam and Delia, supposing my time would come next; but for that once she said nothing to me.

THE MADAM'S SEVERITY.

Mrs. McGee was naturally irritable. Servants always got an extra whipping when she had any personal trouble, as though they could help it. Every morning little Kate, Aunt Delia's little girl, would have to go with the madam on her rounds to the different buildings of the establishment, to carry the key basket. So many were the keys that they were kept in a basket especially provided for them, and the child was its regular bearer. The madam, with this little attendant, was everywhere — in the barn, in the hennery, in the smokehouse — and she always made trouble with the servants wherever she went. Indeed, she rarely returned to the house from these rounds without having whipped two or three servants, whether there was really any cause for the punishment or not. She seldom let a day pass without beating some poor woman unmercifully. The number and severity of these whippings depended more upon the humor of the madam than upon the conduct of the slaves. Of course, I always came in for a share in this brutal treatment. She continued her old habit of boxing my jaws, pinching my ears; no day ever passing without her indulging in this exercise of her physical powers. So long had I endured this, I came to expect it, no matter how well I did my duties; and it had its natural effect upon me, making me a coward, even though I was now growing into manhood. I remember once, in particular, when I had tried to please her by arranging the parlor, I overheard her say: "They soon get spirit—it don't do to praise servants." My heart sank within me. What good was it for me to try to please? She would find fault anyway. Her usual morning greeting was: "Well, Lou, have you dusted the parlors?" "Oh, yes," I would answer. "Have the flowers been arranged?" "Yes, all is in readiness," I would say. Once I had stoned the steps as usual, but the madam grew angry as soon as she saw them. I had labored hard, and thought she would be pleased. The result however, was very far from that. She took me out, stripped me of my shirt and began thrashing me, saying I was spoiled. I was no longer a child, but old enough to be treated differently. I began to cry, for it seemed to me my heart would break. But, after the first burst of tears, the feeling came over me that I was a man, and it was an outrage to treat me so—to keep me under the lash day after day.

A SHOCKING ACCIDENT.

Not long after Mrs. Farrington had made her first visit to our house, she came there to live. Celia had been acting as her maid. When Mrs. Farrington had been up some months, it was decided that all the family should go down to old Master Jack's for a visit. Celia, the maid, had been so hurried in the preparations for this visit that she had done nothing for herself. The night before the family was to leave, therefore, she was getting ready a garment for herself to wear on the trip; and it was supposed that she sewed until midnight, or after, when she fell asleep, letting the goods fall into the candle. All at once, a little after twelve o'clock, I heard a scream, then a cry of "fire! fire!" and Boss yelling: "O Louis! Louis!" I jumped up, throwing an old coat over me, and ran up stairs, in the direction of Mrs. Farrington's room, I encountered Boss in the hall; and, as it was dark and the smoke stifling, I could hardly make any headway. At this moment Mrs. Farrington threw her door open, and screemed for "Cousin Eddie," meaning McGee. He hurriedly called to me to get a pitcher of water quick. I grasped the pitcher from the stand, and he attempted to throw the water on Celia, who was all in a blaze, running around like a mad woman; but the pitcher slipped from his hand and broke, very little of the water reaching her. She was at last wrapped in an old blanket, to extinguish the flames; but she was burned too badly to recover. Boss, being a physician, said at once: "Poor girl, poor girl! she is burned to death." He did all he could for her, wrapped her in linen sheets, and endeavored to relieve her sufferings, but all was of no avail—she had inhaled the flame, injuring her internally, and lived only a few days.

MASTER'S NEW COTTON PLANTATION.

Shortly after Boss bought his home in Memphis, he bought a large farm in Bolivar, Miss. It was a regular cotton farm, on the Missippi river, embracing 200 acres. The houses built for the slaves were heavy meals each day, all the washing and ironing of the finest clothes, besides caring for the babies between times. In the morning she would nurse the babies, then hurry off to the kitchen to get breakfast while they were left in charge of a little girl. Again at noon she repeated her visit to the babies, after cooking the dinner, then in the evening, after supper, she would go to nurse them again. After supper was over, dishes all washed and kitchen in order, she would then go to the little ones for the night. One can see that she had very little time with the children. My heart was sore and heavy, for my wife was almost run to death with work. The children grew puny and sickly for want of proper care. The doctor said it was because the milk the mother nursed to them was so heated by her constant and excessive labors as to be unwholesome, and she never had time to cool before ministering to them. So the little things, instead of thriving and developing, as was their right, dwindled toward the inevitable end. Oh! we were wretched—our hearts ached for a day which we could call our own. My wife was a Christian, and had learned to know the worth of prayer, so would always speak consolingly. "God will help us," she said: "let us try and be patient." Our trial went on, until one morning I heard a great fuss in the house, the madam calling for the yard man to come and tie my wife, as she could not manage her. My wife had always refused to allow the madam to whip her; but now, as the babies were here, mistress thought she would try it once more. Matilda resisted, and madam called for Boss. In a minute he came, and, grabbing my wife, commenced choking her, saying to her, "What do you mean? Is that the way you talk to ladies?" My wife had only said to her mistress, "You shall not whip me." This made her furious, hence her call for Boss. I was in the dining room, and could hear everything. My blood boiled in my veins to see my wife so abused; yet I dare not open my mouth. After the fuss, my wife went straight to the laundry. I followed her there, and found her handling up her babies' clothes, which were washed but not ironed. I knew at a glance that she was going away. Boss had just gone to the city; and I did not know what to say, but I told her to do the best she could. Often when company came and I held the horses, or did an errand for them, they would tip me to a quarter or half a dollar. This money I always saved, and so had a little change, which I now gave to Matilda, for her use in her effort to get away from her cruel treatment. She started at once for Forrest's trader's yards, with the babies in her arms and, after she got into Memphis, she stopped outside the yard to rest. While she was sitting on the curb stone, Forrest came out of the yard by the back gate and saw her. Coming up to her he said: "My God! Matilda, what are you doing here? You have changed so I would not have known you. Why have you come here?" Matilda said: "I came back here to be sold again." He stepped back and called another "nigger trader," Collins by name, from Kentucky. "Look here," said Forrest, pointing to my wife. Collins took in the situation at once and said he would buy her and the children. "That woman is of a good family," said he, "and was only sold to prevent her from getting her freedom." She was then taken into the yard. "Oh!" said Forrest, "I know these McGees, they are hard colts." Word was then sent McGee that his cook was in the yard and had come to be sold. He went in haste to the yard. Collins offered to buy her, but McGee said no man's money could buy that woman and her children. I raised her husband and I would not separate them. She was brought back, and as they rode along in the rockaway, Boss said: "When I am through with you I guess you won't run away again." As they drove up I saw the madam go running out to meet them. She shouted to Matilda: "Ah! madam, you put up at the wrong hotel." They at once went to the barn where my wife was tied to the joist, and Boss and the madam beat her by turns. After they had finished the whipping, Boss said, tauntingly: "Now I am buying you and selling you. I want you to know that I never shall sell you while my head and yours is hot." I was trembling from head to foot, for I was powerless to do anything for her. My twin babies lived only six months after that, not having had the care they needed, and which it was impossible for their mother to give them while performing the almost endless labor required of her, under threats of cruel beatings. One day not long after our babies were buried the madam followed my wife to the smoke house and said: "I am tempted to take that knife from you, Matilda, and cut you in two. You and old Ruben (one of the slaves) went all around the neighborhood and told the people that I killed your babies, and almost whipped you to death." Of course, when the slaves were accused falsely, as in this case, they were not allowed to make any reply—they just had to endure in silence whatever was said.

EFFORTS TO LEARN TO READ AND WRITE.

Thomas, the coachman, and I were fast friends. We used to get together every time we had a chance and talk about freedom. "Oh!" Tom would say, "if I could only write." I remember when Tom first began to take lessons at night from some plasterers, workmen of the neighborhood. They saw that he was so anxious to learn that they promised to teach him every evening if he would slip out to their house. I, too, was eager to learn to read and write, but did not have the opportunity which Tom had of getting out at night. I had to sleep in the house where the folks were, and could not go out without being observed, while Tom had quarters in another part of the establishment, and could slip out unobserved. Tom, however, consoled me by saying that he would teach me as soon as he knew how. So Tom one night put a copy of some figures on the side of the barn for me to practice from. I took the chalk and imitated him as near as I could, but my work was poor beside his,

as he had been learning for some months, and could make the figures quite well and write a little. Still I kept trying. Tom encouraging me and telling me that I would learn in time. "Just keep trying," said he. When this first lesson was over, I forgot to rub out the marks on the barn, and the next morning when Old Master Jack, who happened to be at our home just at that time, went out there and saw the copy and my imitation of it, he at once raised great excitement by calling attention to the rude characters and wanting to know who had done that. I was afraid to own that I had done it; but old Master Jack somehow surmised that it was Tom or I, for he said to Boss: "Edmund, you must watch those fellows, Louis and Thomas, if you don't they will get spoilt—spoilt. They are pretty close to town here—here." Tom and I laughed over this a good deal and how easily we slipped out of it, but concluded not to stop trying to learn all we could. Tom always said: "Lou, I am going to be a free man yet, then we will need some education; no, let us never stop trying to learn." Tom was a Virginian, as I was, and was sold from his parents when a mere lad. Boss used to write to his parents (owners) occasionally, that his

As they passed my hiding-place, en route to their respective apartments, I peeped out through a crevice in the door at them. It was very easy to detect the calm, self-poised man, the thoughtful reasoner, in the still, pale face and erect form of Trueman; whilst the red, hot-flushed countenance, the quick, peering eye and audacious manner of the other, revealed his unpleasant disposition and unsystematized mind.

When the last echo of their retreating footsteps had died upon the ear, I stole from my concealment, and ventured to my own quarters. Many new thoughts sprang into existence in my mind, suggested by the conversation to which I had listened.

I venerated Mr. Trueman more than ever. No disciple ever regarded the face of his master so reverently as I watched his countenance, when I chanced to meet him in any part of the house.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE MISDEMEANOR—THE PUNISHMENT—ITS CONSEQUENCE—FRIGHT.

THE next day Miss Jane, observing my unusual thoughtfulness, said:

"Come, now, Ann, you are not quite free. From the airs that you have put on, one would think you had been made so."

"What have I done, Miss Jane?" This was asked in a quiet tone, perhaps not so obsequiously as she thought it should be. Thereupon she took great offence.

"How dare you, Miss, speak to me in that tone? Take that," and she dealt me a blow across the forehead with a long, limber whalebone, that laid the flesh open. I was so stunned by it that I reeled, and should have fallen to the floor, had I not supported myself by the bed-post.

"Don't you dare to scream."

I attempted to bind up my brow with a handkerchief. This she regarded as affectation.

"Take care, Miss Ann," she often prefixed the Miss when she was mad, by way of taunting me; "give yourself none of these important airs. I'll take you down a little."

When Mr. Summerville entered, she began to cry, saying:

"Husband, this nigger-wench has given me a great deal of impertinence. Father never allowed it; now I want to know if you will not protect me from such insults."

"Certainly, my love, I'll not allow any one, white or black, to insult you. Ann, how dare you give your mistress impudence?"

"I did not mean it, Master William." I had thus addressed him ever since his marriage.

I attempted to relate the conversation that had occurred, wherein Miss Jane thought I had been impudent, when she suddenly sprang up, exclaiming:

"Do you allow a negro to give testimony against your own wife?"

"Certainly not."

"Now, Mr. Summerville," she was getting angry with him, "I require you to whip that girl severely; if you don't do it—why—" and she ground her teeth fiercely.

"I will have her whipped, my dear, but I cannot whip her."

"Why can't you?" and the lady's eye flashed.

"Because I should be injured by it. Gentlemen do not correct negroes; they hire others to do that sort of business."

"Ah, well, then, hire some one who will do it well."

"Come with me, Ann," he said to me, as I stood speechless with fear and mortification.

"Seeing him again motion me to follow, I, forgetful of the injustice that had been done me, and the honest resentment I should feel—forgetful of everything but the humiliation to which they were going to subject me—fell on my knees before Miss Jane, and besought her to excuse, to forgive me, and I would never offend her again.

"Don't dare to ask mercy of me. You know that I am too much like father to spare a nigger."

Ah, well I knew it! and vainly I sued to her. I might have known that she rejoiced too much in the sport; and, had she been in the country, would have asked no higher pleasure than to attend to it personally. A negro's scream of agony was music to her ears.

I governed myself as well as I could while I followed Mr. Summerville through the halls and winding galleries. Down flights of steps, through passages and lobbys we went, until at last we landed in the cellar. There Mr. Summerville surrendered me to the care of a Mr. Monkton, the bar-keeper of the establishment duly appointed and fitted for the office of slave-whipping.

"Here," said Mr. Summerville, "give this girl a good genteel whipping; but no cruelty, Monkton, and here is your fee;" so saying he handed him a half-dollar, then left the dismal cellar.

I have since read long and learned accounts of the gloomy, subterranean cells, in which the cruel ministers of the Spanish Inquisition performed their horrible deeds; and I think this cellar very nearly resembled them. There it was, with its low, damp, vault-like roof; its unwholesome air, earthen floor, covered with broken wine bottles, and oyster cans, the debris of many a wild night's revel! There stood the monster Monkton, with his fierce, lynx eye, his profuse black beard, and frousy brows; a great, stalwart man, of a hard face and manner, forming no bad picture of those wolfish inquisitors of cruel, Catholic Spain!

Over this untempting scene a dim, waning lamp, threw its blue glare, only rendering the place more hideous.

"Now, girl, I am to lick you well. You see the half-dollar. Well, I'm to git the worth of it out of your hide. Now, what would you think if I didn't give you a single lick?"

I looked him full in the face, and even by that equivocal light I had power to discern his horrid purpose, and I quickly and proudly replied,

"I should think you did your duty poorly."

"And why?"

"Because you engaged to do the job, and even received your pay in advance; therefore, if you fail to comply with your bargain, you are not trustworthy."

"Wal, you're smart enough for a lawyer."

"Well, attend to your business."

"This is my business," and he held up a stout wagon-whip; "come, strip off."

"That is not a part of the contract."

"Yes; but it's the way I always whips 'em."

"You were not told to use me so, and I am not going to remove one article of my clothing."

"Yes, but you shall;" and he approached me, his wild eye glaring with a lascivious light, and the deep passion-spot blazing on his cheek.

"Girl, you've got to yield to me. I'll have you now, if its only to show you that I can."

I drew back a few steps, and, seizing a broken bottle, waited, with a deadly purpose, to see what he would do. He came so near that I almost fancied his fetid breath played with its damnable heat upon my very cheek.

"You've got to be mine. I'll give you a fine calico dress, and a pretty pair of ear-bobs!"

This was too much for further endurance. What! must I give up the angel-sealed honor of my life in traffic for trinkets? Where is the woman that would not have hotly resented such an insult?

I turned upon him like a hungry lioness, and just as his wanton hand was about to be laid upon me, I dexterously aimed, and hurled the bottle directly against his left temple. With a low cry of pain he fell to the floor, and the blood oozed freely from the wound.

As my first impression was that I had slain him, so was it my first desperate impulse to kill myself, yet with a second thought came my better intention, and, unlocking the door, I turned and left the gloomy cell. I mounted the dust-covered steps, and rapidly threaded silent, spider-festooned halls, until I regained the upper courts. How beautiful seemed the full gush of day-light to me! But the heavy weight of a supposed crime bowed me to the earth.

My first idea was to proceed directly to Mr. Sommerville's apartment and make a truthful statement of the affair. What he would do or have done to me was a matter upon which I had expended no thought. My apprehension was altogether for the safety of my soul. Homicide was so fearful a thing, that even when committed in actual self-defence, I feared for the justice of it. The Divine interrogatory made to Cain rang with painful [illegible] mental ear-! "Am I my brother's keeper?" I repeated it again and again, and I lived years in the brief space of a moment. Away over the trackless void of the future fled imagination, painting all things and scenes with a sombre color.

The first recognizable person whom I met was Mr. Winston. I knew there was but little to hope for from him, for ever since the argument between himself and Mr. Trueman, he had appeared unusually haughty; and the waiters said that he had become excessively overbearing, that he was constantly knocking them around with his gold-headed cane, and swearing that Kentucky slaves were almost as bad as Northern free negroes.

Henry (who had become a most dear friend of mine) told me that Mr. Winston had on one or two occasions, without the slightest provocation, struck him severely over the head; but these things were pretty generally done in the presence of Mr. Trueman, and for no higher object, I honestly believe, than to annoy that pure-souled philanthropist. So I was assured that he was not one to entrust with my secret, especially as a great intimacy had sprung up between him and Miss Jane. I, therefore, hastily passed him, and a few steps on met Mr. Trueman. How serene appeared his chaste, marble face! Who that looked upon him, with his quiet, reflective eye, but knew that an angel sat enthroned within his bosom? Do not such faces help to prove the perfectibility of the race? If, as the transcendentalists believe, these noble characters are only types of what the whole man will be, may we not expect much from the advent of that dubious personage!

"Mr. Trueman," I said, and my voice was clear and unfaltering, for something in his face and manner exorcised all fear, "I have done a fearful deed."

"What, child?" he asked, and his eye was full of solicitude.

I then gave him a hurried account of what had occurred in the cellar. After a slight pause, he said:

"The best thing for you to do will be to make instant confession to Mr. Summerville. Alas! I fear it will go hard with you, for you are a slave."

I thanked him for the interest he had manifested in me, and passed on to Miss Jane's room. I paused one moment at the door, before turning the knob. What a variety of feelings were at work in my breast! Had I a fellow-creature's blood upon my hands? I trembled in every limb, but at length controlled myself sufficiently to enter.

There sat Miss Jane, engaged at her crochet-work, and Master William playing with the balls of cotton and silk in her little basket.

"Well, Ann, I trust you've got your just deserts, a good whipping," said Miss Jane, as she fixed her eyes upon me.

Very calmly I related all that had occurred. Mr. Summerville sprang to his feet and rushed from the room, whilst Miss Jane set up a series of screams loud enough to reach the most distant part of the house. All my services were required to keep her from swooning, or affecting to swoon.

The ladies from the adjoining room rushed in to her assistance, and were soon busy chafing her hands, rubbing her feet, and bathing her temples.

"Isn't this terrible!" ejaculated one.

"What is the matter?" cried another.

"Poor creature, she is hysterical," was the explanation of a third.

I endeavored to explain the cause of Miss Jane's excitement.

"You did right," said one lady, whose truly womanly spirit burst through all conventionality and restraint.

"What," said one, a genuine Southern conservative, "do you say it was right for a slave to oppose and resist the punishment which her master had directed?"

"Certainly not; but it was right for a female, no matter whether white or black, to resist, even to the shedding of blood, the lascivious advances of a bold libertine."

"Do you believe the girl's story?"

"Yes; why not?"

"I don't; it bears the impress of falsehood on its very face."

"No," added another Kentucky true-blue, "Mr. Monkton was going to whip her, and she resisted him. That's the correct version of the story, I'll bet my life on it."

To all of this aspersion upon myself, I was bound to be a silent auditor, yet ever obeying their slightest order to hand them water, cologne, &c. Is not this slavery indeed?

When Mr. Summerville left the room, he hastily repaired to the bar, where he made the story known, and getting assistance, forthwith went to the cellar, Mr. Winston forming one of the party of investigation. His Southern prejudices were instantly aroused, and he was ready "to do or die" for the propogation of the "peculiar institution."

The result of their trip was to find Monkton very feeble from the loss of blood, and suffering from the cut made by the broken bottle, but with enough life left in him for the fabrication of a falsehood, which was of course believed, as he had a white face. He stated that he had proceeded to the administration of the whipping, directed by my master; that I resisted him; and finding it necessary to bind me, he was attempting to do so, when I swore that I would kill him, and that suiting the action to the word, I hurled the broken bottle at his temples.

When Mr. Summerville repeated this to Miss Jane, in my presence, stating that it was the testimony that Monkton was prepared to give in open court, for I was to be arrested, I could not refrain from uttering a cry of surprise, and saying:

"Mr. Monkton has misrepresented the case, as 'I can show.'"

"Yes, but you will not be allowed to give evidence," said Master William.

"Will Mr. Monkton's testimony be taken?" I inquired.

"Certainly, but a negro cannot bear witness against a white person."

I said nothing, but many thoughts were troubling me.

"You see, Ann, what your bad conduct has brought you to," said Miss Jane.

Again I attempted to tell the facts of the case, and defend myself, but she interrupted me, saying:

"Do you suppose I believe a word of that? I can assure you I do not, and, moreover, I'm not going to spend my money to have a lawyer employed to keep you from the punishment you so richly deserve. So you must content yourself to take the public hanging or whipping in the jail yard, which is the penalty that will be affixed to your crime." Turning to Mr. Summerville, she added, "I think it will do Ann good, for it will take down her pride, and make her a valuable nigger. She has been too proud of her character; for my part, I had rather she had had less virtue. I've always thought she was virtuous because she did not want us to increase in property, and was too proud to have her children live in bondage."

I dared not make any remark; but there I stood in dread of the approaching arrest, which came full soon.

As I was sewing for Miss Jane, Mr. Summerville opened the door, and said to a rough man, pointing to me—

"There's the girl."

"Come along with me to jail, gal."

How fearfully sounded the command. The jail-house was a place of terror, and though I had in my brief life "supped full of horrors," this was a new species of torture that I had hoped to leave untasted.

Taking with me nothing but my bonnet, I followed Constable Calcraft down stairs into the street. Upon one of the landings I met Henry, and I knew from his kindly mournful glance, that he gave me all his compassion.

"Good-bye, Ann," he said, extending his hand to me, "good-bye, and keep of good cheer; the Lord will be with you." I looked at him, and saw that his lip was quivering; and his dark eye glittered with a furtive tear. I dared not trust my voice, so, with a grateful pressure of the hand, I passed him by, keeping up my composure right stoutly. At the foot of the stair I met Louise, who was weeping.

"I believe you, Ann, we all believe you, and the Lord will make it appear on the day of your trial that you are right; only keep up your spirits, and read this," and she slipped a little pocket-Testament into my hand, which was a welcome present.

Now, I thought, the last trial is over. All the tender ones who love me have spoken their comforting words, and I may resume my pride and hauteur; but no—standing within the vestibule was the man whom I reverenced above all others, Mr. Trueman. One effort more, and then I might be calm; but before the sunshine of his kindliness the snow and ice of my pride melted and passed away in showers of tears. The first glance of his pitying countenance made me weep. I was weary and heavy-laden, and, even as to a mortal brother, I longed to pour into his ear the pent-up agony of my soul.

"Poor girl," he said kindly, as he offered me his white and finely-formed hand, "I believe you innocent; there is that in your clear, womanly look, your unaffected utterance, that proves to me you are worthy to be heard. Trust in God."

Oh, can I ever forget the diamond-like glister of his blue eyes! and that tear was evoked from its fountain for my sorrow; even then I felt a thrill of joy. We love to have the sympathy and confidence of the truly great. I made no reply, in words, to Mr. Trueman, but he understood me.

Conducted by the constable, I passed through a number of streets, all crowded with the busy and active, perhaps the happy. Ah, what a fable that word seemed to express! I used to doubt every smiling face I saw, and think it a radiant lie! but, since then, though in a subdued sense, I have learned that mortals may be happy.

We stopped, after a long walk, in front of a large building of Ionic architecture, and of dark brown stone, ornamented by beautiful finings, with a tasteful slope of rich sward in front, adorned with a variety of flowers and shrubbery. Through this we passed and reached the first court, which was surrounded by a high stone-wall. Passing through a low-door-way, we stood on the first pave; here I was surrendered to the keeping of the jailer, a man apparently devoid of generosity and humanity. After hearing from Constable Calcraft an account of the crime for which I was committed, he observed—

"A sassy, impudent, unruly gal, I guess; we have plenty sick; this will larn her a lessin. Come with me," he said, as he turned his besotted face toward me.

Through dirty, dark, filthy passages I went, until we reached a gloomy, loathsome apartment, in which he rudely thrust me, saying—

"Thar's your quarters."

Such a place as it was! A small room of six by eight, with a dirty, discolored floor, over which rats and mice scampered ad libitum. One miserable little iron grate let in a stray ray of daylight, only revealing those loathsome things which the friendly darkness would have concealed. Cowering in the corner of this wretched pen was a poor, neglected white woman, whose face seemed unacquainted with soap and water, and her hair tagged, ragged, and unused to comb or brush. She clasped to her breast a weasly suckling, that every now and then gave a sickly cry, indicative of the cholic or a heated atmosphere.

"Poor comfort!" said the woman, as I entered. "poor comfort here, whare the starved wretches are cryin' for ar. My baby has bin a sinkin' ever sense I come here. I'd not keer much if we could both die."

"For what are you to be tried?"

"For takin' a loaf of bread to keep myself and child from starvin'."

She then asked me for what I stood accused. I told her my story, and we grew quite talkative and sociable, thereby realizing the old axiom, "Misery loves company."

* * * * * * *

For several days I lingered on thus, diversifying the time only by reading my Testament, the gift of Louise, and occasionally having a long talk with my companion, whom I learned to address by the name of Fanny. She was a woman of remarkably sensitive feelings, quick and warm in all her impulses; just such a creature as an education and kindly training would have made lovely and lovable; but she had been [illegible] neglected—had grown up a complete human weed.

Our meals were served round to us upon a large wooden drawer, as filthy as dirt and grease could make it. The cuisine dashed our rations, a slice of fat bacon and "pone" of corn bread to us, with as little ceremony as though we had been dogs; and we were allowed one blanket to sleep on.

One day, when I felt more than usually gloomy, I was agreeably disappointed, as the cumbersome door opened to admit my kind friend Louise. The jailer remarked:

"You may stay about a quarter of an hour, but no longer."

"Thank you, sir," she replied.

"This is very kind of you, Louise," for I was touched by the visit.

"I wanted to see you, Ann; and look what I brought you!" She held a beautiful bouquet to me.

"Thank you, thank you a thousand times, this is too kind," I said, as I watered the lovely flowers with my tears.

"Oh, they were sent to you," she answered, with a smile.

"And who sent them?"

"Why, Henry, of course;" and again she smiled.

I knew not why, but I felt the blood rushing warmly to my face, as I bent my head very low, to conceal a confusion which I did not understand.

"But here is something that I did bring you," and, opening a basket, she drew out a nice, tempting pie, some very delicious fruit cake, and white bread.

"I suppose your fare is miserable?"

"Oh, worse than miserable."

Fanny drew near me, and without the least timidity, stretched forth her hand.

"Oh, please give me some, only a little; I'm nearly starved?"

I freely gave her the larger portion, for she could enjoy it. I had the flowers, the blessed flowers, that Henry had sent, and they were food and drink for me!

Louise informed me that, since my arrest, she had cleared up and arranged Miss Jane's room; and she thought it was Mr. Summerville's intention to sell me after the trial.

was now a man of social position; of very decided talent and energy. "I know of no man," continued Mr. Trueman, "who is more deserving of public trust than Douglas. He conducts himself with extreme modesty and propriety, and a quiet dignity that inclines the most fastidious in his favor."

He then cited the case of Miss Greenfield (the black swan), showing that my race was susceptible of cultivation and refinement in a high degree.

Thus inspired, I poured forth my full soul to him. I told him how, in secret, I had studied; how diligently I had searched after knowledge; how I longed for the opportunity to improve my poor talents. I spoke freely, and with a degree of nervous enthusiasm that seemed to affect him.

"Ann," he said, and large tears stood in his eyes, "it is a shame for you to be kept in bondage. A proud, aspiring soul like yours, if once free to follow its impulses, might achieve much. Can you not labor to buy yourself? At odd times do extra work, and, by your savings, you may, in the course of years, be enabled to buy yourself."

"My dear sir, I've no 'odd times' for extra work, or I would gladly avail myself of them. Lazy I am not; but my mistress requires all my time and labor. If she were to discover that I was working, even at night for myself, she would punish me severely."

I said this in a mournful tone; for I felt that despair was my portion. He was silent for awhile; then said,

"Well, you must do the best you can. I would that I could advise you; but now I must leave. A longer stay would excite suspicion. You heard what they said the other day about Abolitionists."

I remembered it well, and was distressed to think that he had been abused on my account.

With many kind words he took his leave, and I felt as if the sunshine had suddenly been extinguished.

During his entire visit poor Fanny had slept. She lay like one in an opium trance. For hours after his departure she remained so, and much time was left me for reflection.

CHAPTER XXXII.

EXECUTION OF THE SENTENCE—A CHANGE—HOPE.

On the last and concluding day of the term of the court, the jailer signified to me that the constable would, on the morrow, administer the first fifty lashes; and, of course, I passed the night in great trepidation.

But the morning came bright and clear, and the jailer, accompanied by Constable Calcraft, entered.

"Come, girl, said the latter, "I have to execute the sentence upon you."

Without one word, I followed him into the jail yard.

"Strip yourself to the waist," said the constable.

I dared not hesitate, though feminine delicacy was rudely shocked. With a prayer to heaven for fortitude, I obeyed.

Then, with a strong cowhide, he inflicted fifty lashes (the first instalment of the sentence) upon my bare back; each lacerating it to the bone. I was afterwards compelled to put my clothes on over my raw, bloody back, without being allowed to wash away the clotted gore; for, upon asking for water to cleanse myself, I was harshly refused, and quickly re-conducted to the cell, where, wounded, mortified, and anguish-stricken, I was left to myself.

Oh, God of the world-forgotten Africa! Thou dost see these things; Thou dost hear the cries which daily and nightly we are sending up to Thee! On that lonely, wretched night Thou wert with me, and my prison became as a radiant mansion, for angels cheered me there! Glory to God for the cross which He sent me; for it led me on to Him.

Poor Fanny, after her sentence was pronounced, was soon sent to the work-house; so I was alone. The little Testament which Louise had given me, was all the company that I desired. Its rich and varied words were as manna to my hungry soul; and its blessed promises rescued me from a dreadful bankruptcy of faith.

Subsequently, and at three different times, I was led forth to receive the remainder of my punishment.

After the last portion was given, I was allowed to go to the kitchen of the jail and wash myself and dress in some clean clothes, which Miss Jane had sent me. I was then conducted by the constable to the hotel.

Miss Jane met me very distantly, saying—

"I trust you are somewhat humbled, Ann, and will in future be a better nigger."

I was in but a poor mood to take rebukes and reproaches; for my flesh was perfectly raw, the intervals between the whippings having been so short as not to allow the gashes even to close; so that upon this, the final day, my back presented one mass of filth and clotted gore. I was then, as may be supposed, in a very irritable humor, but a slave is not allowed to have feeling. It is a privilege denied him, because his skin is black.

I did not go out of Miss Jane's room, except on matters of business, about which she sent me. I would, then, go slipping around, afraid of meeting Henry. I did not wish him to see me in that mutilated condition. I saw Louise in Miss Jane's room; but there she merely nodded to me. Subsequently we met in a retired part of the hall, and there she expressed that generous and friendly sympathy which I knew she so warmly cherished for me.

Somehow or other she had contrived to insinuate herself wondrously into Miss Jane's good graces; and all her influence she endeavored to use in my favor.

In this private interview she told me that she would induce

Miss Jane to let me sleep in her room; and she thought she knew what key to take her on.

"If," added she, "I get you to my apartment, I will care for you well. I will wash and dress your wounds, and render you every attention in my power."

I watched, with admiration, her tactics in managing Miss Jane. That evening when I was seated in an obscure corner of the room, Miss Jane was lolling in a large arm-chair, playing with a bouquet that had been sent her by a gentleman. This bouquet had been delivered to her, as I afterwards learned, by Louise. Miss Jane had grown to be fashionable indeed; and had two favorite beaux, with whom she interchanged notes, and Louise had been selected as a messenger.

On this occasion, the wily mulatto came up to her, rather familiarly, I thought, and said—

"Ah, you are amusing yourself with the Captain's flowers! I must tell him of it. Dear sakes! but it will please him;" she then whispered something to her, at which both of them laughed heartily.

After this Miss Jane was in a very decided good humor, and Louise fussed about the apartment pretty much as she pleased. At length, throwing open the window, she cried out—

"How close the air is here! Why, Mrs. St. Lucian, the fashionable, dashing lady who occupied this room just before you, Mrs. Somerville, wouldn't allow three persons to be in it at a time; and her servant-girl always slept in my room. By the way, that just reminds me how impolite I've been to you; do excuse me, and I will be glad to relieve you by letting Ann go to my room of nights."

"Oh, it will trouble you, Louise."

"Don't talk or think of troubling me; but come along girl," she said, turning to me.

"Go with Louise, Ann," added Miss Jane, as she perceived me hesitate, "but come early in the morning to get me ready for breakfast."

Happy even for so small a favor as this, I followed Louise to her room. There I found everything very comfortable and neat. A nice, downy bed, with its snowy covering; a bright-colored carpet, a little bureau, washstand, clock, rocking-chair, and one or two pictures, with a few crocks of flowers, completed the tasteful furniture of this apartment.

All this, I inly said, is the arrangement and taste of a mulatto in the full enjoyment of her freedom! Do not her thrift and industry disprove the oft-repeated charge of indolence that is made upon the negro race?

She seemed to read my thoughts, and remarked, "You are surprised, Ann, to see my room so nice! I read the wonder in your face. I have marked it before, in the countenances of slaves. They are taught, from their infancy up, to regard themselves as unfit for the blessings of free, civilized life; and I am happy to give the lie, by my own manner of living, to this rude charge."

"How long have you been free, Louise, and how did you obtain your freedom?"

"It is a long story," she answered; "you must be inclined to sleep; you need rest. At some other time I'll tell you. Here, take this arm-chair, it is soft; and your back is wounded and sore; I am going to dress it for you."

So saying, she left the room, but quickly returned with a basin of warm water and a little canteen of grease. She very kindly bade me remove my dress, then gently, with a soft linten-rag, washed my back, greased it, and made me put on one of her linen chemises and a nice gown, and giving me a stimulant, bade me rest myself for the night upon her bed, which was clean, white, and tempting.

When she thought I was soundly sleeping, she removed from a little swinging book-shelf a well-worn Bible. After reading a chapter or so, she sank upon her knees in prayer! There may be those who would laugh and scoff at the piety of this woman, because of her tawny complexion; but the Great Judge, to whose ear alone her supplication was made, disregards all such distinctions. Her soul was as precious to Him, as though her complexion had been of the most spotless snow.

On the following morning, whilst I was arranging Miss Jane's toilette, she said to me, in rather a kind tone :

"Ann, Mr. Summerville wants to sell you, and purchase a smaller and cheaper girl for me. Now, if you behave yourself well, I'll allow you to choose your own home."

This was more kindness than I expected to receive from her, and I thanked her heartily.

All that day my heart was dreaming of a new home—perhaps a kind, good one! On the gallery I met Mr. Trueman (I love to write his name). Rushing eagerly up to him, I offered my hand, all oblivious of the wide chasm that the difference of race had placed between us; but, if that thought had occurred to me, his benignant smile would have put it to flight. Ah, he was the true reformer, who illustrated, in his own deportment, the much talked-of theory of human brotherhood! He, with all his learning, his native talent, his social position and legal prominence, could condescend to speak in a familiar spirit to the lowliest slave, and this made me, soured to harshness, feel at ease in his presence.

I told him that I was fast recovering from the effects of my whipping- I spoke of Louise's kindness, &c.

"I am to be sold, Mr. Trueman; I wish that you would buy me."

"My good girl, if I had the means I would not hesitate to make the purchase, and instantly draw up your free papers; but I am, at the present, laboring under great pecuniary embarrassments, which deny me the right of exercising that generosity which my heart prompts in this case."

I thanked him, over and over again, for his kindness. I felt not a little distressed when he told me that he should leave for Boston early on the following day. In bidding me adieu, he slipped, very modestly, into my hand a ten-dollar bill, but this I could not accept from one to whom I was already heavily indebted.

you pick cotton rapidly?" Sometimes the slave would be required to open his mouth that the purchaser might examine the teeth and form some opinion as to his age and physical soundness; and if it was suspected that a slave had been beaten a good deal he would be required to step into another room and undress. If the person desiring to buy found the slave badly scarred by the common usage of whipping, he would say at once to the foreman: "Why! this slave is not worth much, he is all scarred up. No, I don't want him; bring me in another to look at." Slaves without scars from whipping and looking well physisally always sold readily. They were never left long in the yard. It was expected that all the slaves in the yard for sale would be neatly dressed and clean before being brought into the show-room. It was the foreman's business to see that each one was presentable.

SLAVE WHIPPING AS A BUSINESS.

Whipping was done at these markets, or trader's yards, all the time. People who lived in the city of Richmond would send their slaves here for punishment. When any one wanted a slave whipped he would send a note to that effect with the servant to the trader. Any petty offense on the part of a slave was sufficient to subject the offender to this brutal treatment. Owners who affected culture and refinement preferred to send a servant to the yard for punishment to inflicting it themselves. It saved them trouble, they said, and possibly a slight wear and tear of feeling. For this service the owner was charged a certain sum for each slave, and the earnings of the traders from this source formed a very large part of the profits of his business. The yard I was in had a regular whipping post to which they tied the slave, and gave him "nine-and-thirty," as it was called, meaning thirty-nine lashes as hard as they could lay it on. Men were stripped of their shirts in preparation for the whipping, and women had to take off their dresses from the shoulders to the waist. These whippings were not so severe as when the slaves were stripped entirely of their clothes, as was generally the case on the plantations where slaves were owned by the dozen. I saw many cases of whipping while I was in the yard. Sometimes I was so frightened that I trembled violently, for I had never seen anything like it before.

SOLD IN THE MARKET.

I was only in the yard a short time before I was had to wait on the table, sweep the large yard every morning with a brush broom and go for the mail once a week. I used to get very tired, for I was young and consequently not strong. Aside from these things which came regularly, I had to help the madam in warping the cloth. I dreaded this work, for I always got my ears boxed if I did not or could not do the work to suit her. She always made the warp herself and put it in, and I had to hand her the thread as she put it through the harness. I would get very tired at this work and, like any child, wanted to be at play, but I could not remember that the madam ever gave me that privilege. Saddling the horse at first was troublesome to me, but Boss was constant in his efforts to teach me, and, after many trials, I learned the task satisfactorily to the master and to bring the horse to the door when he wished to go out for business or pleasure. Riding horseback was common for both ladies and gentlemen, and sometimes I would have to saddle three or more horses when Boss, the madam, a friend or friends desired a ride. Bird hunting parties were common and were greatly enjoyed, by the young people especially. Boss always invited some of the young people of the neighborhood to these parties and they never failed to put in an appearance. Williams, Bradford and Freeman were the sons of rich planters, and were always participants in this sport, and their young lady friends joined in it as on-lookers. The young men singing and whistling to the birds, I in the meantime setting the net. As soon as I had got the net in order they would approach the birds slowly, driving them into it. There was great laughter and excitement if they were successful in catching a fine flock.

CRUEL TREATMENT.

I was but a lad, yet I can remember well the cruel treatment I received. Some weeks it seemed I was whipped for nothing, just to please my mistress' fancy. Once, when I was sent to town for the mail and had started back, it was so dark and rainy my horse got away from me and I had to stay all night in town. The next morning when I got back home I had a severe whipping, because the master was expecting a letter containing money and was disappointed in not receiving it that night, as he was going to Panola to spend Christmas. However, the day came and all the family went except me. During the time they were gone the overseer whipped a man so terribly with the "bull whip" that I had to go for the doctor, and when Dr. Heningford, the regular family physician, came, he said it was awful—such cruel treatment, and he complained about it. It was common for a slave to get an "over-threshing," that is, to be whipped too much. The poor man was cut up so badly all over that the doctor made a bran poultice and wrapped his entire body in it. This was done to draw out the inflammation. It seems the slave had been sick, and had killed a little pig when he became well enough to go to work, as his appetite craved hearty food, and he needed it to give him strength for his tasks. For this one act, comparatively trivial, he was almost killed. The idea never seemed to occur to the slave holders that these slaves were getting no wages for their work and, therefore, had nothing with which to procure what, at times, was necessary for their health and strength—palatable and nourishing food. When the slaves took anything the masters called it stealing, yet they were stealing the slaves' time year after year. When Boss came home he was called on by the town officials, for the case had been reported to them. Boss, however, got out of it by saying that he was not at home when the trouble occurred. The poor slave was sick from his ill treatment some four or five months, and when he recovered there was a running sore left on his body, from the deep cuts of the whip, which never healed. I can not forget how he looked, the sore was a sickening sight; yet, when he was able to walk he had to return to work in the field.

I had not been at Pontotoc very long when I saw the hounds run a slave, by name Ben Lyon. "Old Ben," as he was called, ran away and had been gone a week when he was seen by a woman who "told on him," and then I was sent to get the man who had trained dogs, or hounds as they were called. The dogs ran the slave about ten miles when they lost track at a creek, but he was caught that night in a farmer's house getting something to eat.

INSTRUCTIONS IN MEDICINE.

After some time, Boss began to tell me the names of medicines and their properties. I liked this and seemed to grasp the idea very well. After giving me a number of names he would make me repeat them. Then he would tell me the properties of each medicine named, how it was used and for what purpose and how much constituted a dose. He would drill me in all this until I knew it and, in a short time, he would add other names to the list. He always showed me each medicine named and had me smell and carefully examine it that I might know it when seen again. I liked this, and used to wish that I was as wise as my master. He was very precise, steady and gentle in any case of sickness, and, although he had long retired from the medical world, all recognized his merit wherever he went. I used to go to the woods and gather slippery elm, alum root and the roots of wild cherry and poplar, for we used all these in compounding medicines for the servants.

THE OVERSEER—WHIPPINGS AND OTHER CRUELTIES.

The overseer was a man hired to look after the farm and whip the slaves. Very often they were not only cruel, but barbarous. Every farmer or planter considered an overseer a necessity. As a rule, there was also on each plantation, a foreman—one of the brighter slaves, who was held responsible for the slaves under him, and whipped if they did not come up to the required task. There was, too, a forewoman, who, in like manner, had charge of the female slaves, and also the boys and girls from twelve to sixteen years of age, and all the old people that were feeble.

This was called the trash gang. Ah! it would make one's heart ache to see those children and how they were worked. Cold, frosty mornings, the little ones would be crying from cold; but they had to keep on. Aunt Polly, our forewoman, was afraid to allow them to run to get warm, for fear the overseer would see them. Then she would be whipped, and he would make her whip all of the gang. At length, I became used to severe treatment of the slaves; but, every little while something would happen to make me wish I were dead. Everything was in a bustle—always there was slashing and whipping. I remember when Boss made a change in our overseer. It was the beginning of the year. Riley, one of the slaves, who was a principal plower, was not on hand for work one Monday morning, having been delayed in fixing the bridle of his mule, which the animal, for lack of something better, perhaps, had been vigorously chewing and rendered nearly useless. He was, therefore, considerably behind time, when he reached the field. Without waiting to learn what was the reason for the delay, the overseer sprang upon him with his bull whip, which was about seven feet long, lashing him with all his strength, every stroke leaving its mark upon the poor man's body, and finally the knot at the end of the whip buried itself in the fleshy part of the arm, and there came around it a festering sore. He suffered greatly with it, until one night his brother took out the knot, when the poor fellow was asleep, for he could not bear any one to touch it when he was awake. It was awful to hear the cracking of that whip as it was laid about Riley—one would have thought that an ox team had gotten into the mire, and was being whipped out, so loud and sharp was the noise!

I usually slept in the dining room on the floor. Early one morning an old slave, by name of "Uncle Jim," came and knocked at the window, and upon my jumping up and going to him, he told me to tell Boss that Uncle Jim was there. He had run away, some time before, and, for some reason, had returned. Boss, upon hearing the news, got up and sent me to tell the overseer to come at once. He came, and, taking the bull whip, a cowhide and a lot of peach-tree switches, he and Boss led Uncle Jim back into the cow lot, on the side of the hill, where they drove four stakes in the ground, and, laying him flat on his face, tied his hands and feet to these stakes. After whipping him, bought by one George Reid who lived in Richmond. He had no wife, but an old lady kept house for him and his three sons. At this time he had a place in the postoffice, but soon after I came there he lost it. He then moved into the country upon a farm of about one thousand acres, enclosed by a cedar hedge. The house was a plain frame structure upon a stone basement and contained four rooms. It was surrounded with shrubbery, and was a pleasant country seat. But I did not like it here. I grieved continually about my mother. It came to me, more and more plainly, that I would never see her again. Young and lonely as I was, I could not help crying, oftentimes for hours together. It was hard to get used to being away from my mother. I remember well "Aunt Sylvia," who was the cook in the Reid household. She was very kind to me and always spoke consolingly to me, especially if I had been blue, and had had one of my fits of crying. At these times she would always bake me an ash cake for supper, saying to me: "My child, don't cry; 'Aunt Sylvia' will look after you." This ash cake was made of corn meal and water, a little salt to make it palatable, and was baked by putting it between cabbage leaves and covering it with hot ashes. A sweeter or more delicious cake one could not desire, and it was common upon the tables of all the Virginia farmers. I always considered it a great treat to get one of these cakes from "Aunt Sylvia."

The appellations of "aunt" and "uncle" for the older slaves were not only common among the blacks, but the whites also addressed them in the same way.

ON THE AUCTION BLOCK

I was sick a great deal—in fact, I had suffered with chills and fever ever since Mr. Reid bought me. He, therefore, concluded to sell me, and, in November, 1844, he took me back to Richmond, placing me in the Exchange building, or auction rooms, for the sale of slaves. The sales were carried on in a large hall where those interested in the business sat around a large block or stand, upon which the slave to be sold was placed, the auctioneer standing beside him. When I was placed upon the block, a Mr. McGee came up and felt of me and asked me what I could do. "You look like a right smart nigger," said he, "Virginia always produces good darkies." Virginia was the mother of slavery, and it was held by many that she had the best slaves. So when Mr. McGee found I was born and bred in that state he seemed satisfied.

The bidding commenced, and I remember well when the auctioneer said: "Three hundred eighty dollars —once, twice and sold to Mr. Edward McGee." He was a rich cotton planter of Pontotoc, Miss. As near as I can recollect, I was not more than twelve years of age, so did not sell for very much.

PRICE OF SLAVES.

Servant women sold for $500 to $700, and sometimes as high as $800 when possessing extra qualifications. A house maid, bright in looks, strong and well formed, would sell for $1,000 to $1,200. Bright mulatto girls, well versed in sewing and knitting, would sometimes bring as high as $1,800, especially if a Virginian or a Kentuckian. Good blacksmiths sold for $1,600 to $1,800. When the slaves were put upon the block they were always sold to the highest bidder. Mr. McGee, or "Boss," as I soon learned to call him, bought sixty other slaves before he bought me, and they were started in a herd for Atlanta, Ga., on foot.

STARTED FOR A COTTON PLANTATION.

Boss, myself and ten others met them there. We then started for Pontotoc, Miss. On our way we stopped at Edenton, Ga., where Boss sold twenty-one of the sixty slaves. We then proceeded on our way, Boss by rail and we on foot, or in the wagon. We went about twenty miles a day. I remember, as we passed along, every white man we met was yelling, "Hurrah for Polk and Dallas!" They were feeling good, for election had given them the men that they wanted. The man who had us in charge joined with those we met in the hurrahing. We were afraid to ask them the reason for their yelling, as that would have been regarded as an impertinence, and probably would have caused us all to be whipped.

MY MISSISSIPPI HOME.

At length, after a long and wearisome journey, we reached Pontotoc, McGee's home, on Christmas eve. Boss took me into the house and into the sitting room, where all the family were assembled, and presented me as a Christmas gift to the madam, his wife.

My boss, as I remember him, was a tall, raw-boned man, but rather distinguished in looks, with a fine carriage, brilliant in intellect, and considered one of the wealthiest and most successful planters of his time. Mrs. McGee was a handsome, stately lady, about thirty years of age, brunette in complexion, faultless in figure and imperious in manner. I think them in jail, to be "sold down the river." This was a deliberate attempt to keep them from their rights, for he knew that they were to have been set free, many years before; and this fact was known to all the neighborhood. My wife's mother was born free, her mother, having passed the allotted time under a law, had been free for many years. Yet they kept her children as slaves, in plain violation of law as well as justice. The children of free persons under southern laws were free — this was always admitted. The course of Logan in putting the family in jail, for safe keeping until they could be sent to the southern market, was a tacit admission that he had no legal hold upon them. Woods and Collins, a couple of "nigger traders," were collecting a "drove" of slaves for Memphis, about this time, and, when they were ready to start, all the family were sent off with the gang; and, when they arrived in Memphis, they were put in the traders' yard of Nathan Bedford Forrest. This Forrest afterward became a general in the rebel army, and commanded at the capture of Fort Pillow; and, in harmony with the debasing influences of his early business, he was responsible for the fiendish massacre of negroes after the capture of the fort—an act which will make his name forever infamous. None of this family were sold to the same person except my wife and one sister. All the rest were sold to different persons. The elder daughter was sold seven times in one day. The reason of this was that the parties that bought her, finding that she was not legally a slave, and that they could get no written guarantee that she was, got rid of her as soon as possible. It seems that those who bought the other members of the family were not so particular, and were willing to run the risk. They knew that such things—such outrages upon law and justice—were common. Among these was my Boss, who bought two of the girls, Matilda and her sister Mary Ellen. Matilda was bought for a cook; her sister was a present to Mrs. Farrington, his wife's sister, to act as her maid and seamstress. Aunt Delia, who had been cook, was given another branch of work to do, and Matilda was installed as cook. I remember well the day she came. The madam greeted her, and said: "Well, what can you do, girl? Have you ever done any cooking? Where are you from?" Matilda was, as I remember her, a sad picture to look at. She had been a slave, it is true, but had seen good days to what the slaves down the river saw. Any one could see she was almost heart-broken—she never seemed happy. Days grew into weeks and weeks into months, but the same routine of work went on.

MY MARRIAGE—BIRTH OF TWINS.

Matilda had been there three years when I married her. The Boss had always promised that he would give me a nice wedding, and he kept his word. He was very proud, and liked praise. The wedding that he gave us was indeed a pleasant one. All the slaves from their neighbor acquaintances were invited. One thing Boss did was a credit to him, but it was rare among slave-holders—he had me married by their parish minister. It was a beautiful evening, the 30th of November, 1858, when Matilda and I stood in the parlor of the McGee house and were solemnly made man and wife. Old Master Jack came up from Panola at that time, and was there when the ceremony was performed. As he looked through his fingers at us, he was overheard saying: "It will ruin them, givin wedins-wedins." Things went on as usual after this. The madam grew more irritable and exacting, always finding fault with the servants, whipping them, or threatening to do so, upon the slightest provocation, or none at all. There was something in my wife's manner, however, which kept the madam from whipping her. An open or implied threat perhaps that such treatment would not be endured without resistance or protest of some kind. This the madam regarded as a great indignity, and she hated my wife for it, and, as I think, was ready to crush her, so great was her anger. In a year there were born to us twin babies, and the madam now thought she had my wife fast, as the babies would be a barrier to anything like resistance on her part, and there would be no danger of her running away. She, therefore, thought that she could enjoy, without hindrance, the privilege of beating the women of whose womanhood she had thoroughly stood somewhat in fear.

A BRAVE DEFENDER OF MY WIFE AND CHILDREN.

Soon after from the first that I should give my wife assistance, as she needed time to care for the babies. Really he was not as bad as the madam at heart, for she tried to see how hard she could be on us. She gave me all the extra work to do that she could think of, apparently to keep me from helping my wife in the kitchen. She had all the cooking tools for three

DEATH TO RUNAWAY SLAVES.

It was about this time, that the law or regulation of the rebel government was promulgated, authorizing or directing the shooting or hanging of any slave caught trying to get away to the Union army. This barbarous law was carried out in many cases, for every little while we would hear of some slave who was caught running away, and hung or shot. A slave belonging to Boss, ran away, and got safely within the Union lines; but he returned to get his sister. They both got away from the house, but had gone only a few miles, when William McGee overtook them, and shot the man dead. William boasted of this, but told Uncle Peter, the foreman, that he never wanted it mentioned.

SLAVES HUNG AND LEFT TO ROT AS A WARNING.

Two slaves belonging to one Wallace, one of our nearest neighbors, had tried to escape to the Union soldiers, but were caught, brought back and hung. All of our servants were called up, told every detail of the runaway and capture of the poor creatures and their shocking murder, and then compelled to go and see them where they hung. I never shall forget the horror of the scene—it was sickening. The bodies hung at the roadside, where the execution took place, until the blue flies literally swarmed around them, and the stench was fearful. This barbarous spectacle was for the purpose of showing the passing slaves what would be the fate of those caught in the attempt to escape, and to secure the circulation of the details of the awful affair among them, throughout all the neighborhood. It is difficult at this day for those not familiar with the atrocities of the institution of slavery to believe that such scenes could ever have been witnessed in this or any other civilized land, as a result simply of a human being's effort to reach a portion of the country, where the freedom of which it was said to be the home, could be enjoyed without molestation. Yet such was the horrible truth in not one case alone, but in many, as I know only too well.

RUNAWAY SLAVE CAUGHT AND WHIPPED.

One day while I was waiting at dinner, some of the children from the slave quarters came running into the house, and said to old Master Jack: "Uncle John is going away—he is down to the creek." He had been put in the carpenter shop, fastened in the stocks, but by some means he had gotten the stocks off his feet, and got lose. All in the house immediately got up and ran out. Old master told me to run and catch the runaway. I did not like to do it, but had to obey. Old master and I ran in pursuit, and soon overtook him. He could not run, as the stocks were still on his arms and neck. We brought him back, and he was "staked out"—that is, four stakes were driven into the ground, the arms tied to two and the legs to the other two. He was then paddled with the whipping paddle upon the bottom of his feet, by old Master Jack, until blood blisters arose, when he took his knife and opened them. I was then sent for salt and water, and the bruises of the suffering chattel were washed as usual in the stinging brine.

A HOME GUARD ACCIDENTALLY SHOOTS HIMSELF.

After the capture of Memphis by the Union forces, the soldiers were in the habit of making raids into the surrounding country. These were a source of alarm and anxiety among the people, and they were constantly on the watch to defend their property and themselves, as best they could. One day Dr. Charles Dandridge went over to one of our neighbors, Mr. Bobor's, to practice shooting, and to see if he had heard anything new about the war. It was the custom of the home-guards to meet weekly, and practice with their fire-arms, in order to be the better prepared, as they pretended, for any sudden incursion of the now dreaded Yankee. Mr. Bobor had gotten a Yankee pistol from some friend, who was in the army, and Dr. Charles wanted to see and try it. It was shown him, and its workings explained. He took it and began shooting, and in showing the other men how quickly he could shoot a Yankee, and mount his horse, he accidentally shot himself under the short rib near his heart, and fell to the ground. All the men came running to him, picked him up and carried him into the house, immediately sending word to Mrs. Dandridge and Master Jack McGee, his father-in-law. The boys came hurrying in, and told us what had happened. I hitched up and drove Boss over to Mr. Bobor's. We found the wounded man rapidly sinking; and when, a little later, his wife came, he could not speak—only clasped her hand. He died that night, and we carried his body to the home, which so short a time before, he had left in health and high spirits.

Examination of slaves for sale.

Canot, Theodore

Adventures of an African Slaver. New York: Garden City ~~Press~~ Publishing Co., 1928.

X: African Fever

I WAS a close watcher of Mongo-John whenever he engaged in the purchase of slaves. As each negro was brought before him, Ormond examined the subject, without regard to sex, from head to foot. A careful manipulation of the chief muscles, joints, arm-pits, and groins was made, to assure soundness. The mouth, too, was inspected, and if a tooth was missing, it was noted as a defect liable to deduction. Eyes, voice, lungs, fingers, and toes were not forgotten; so that when the negro passed from the Mongo's hands without censure, he might have been readily adopted as a good "life" by an insurance company.

Upon one occasion, to my great astonishment, I saw a stout and apparently powerful man discarded by Ormond as utterly worthless. His full muscles and sleek skin, to my unpractised eye, denoted the height of robust health. Still, I was told that he had been medicated for the market with bloating drugs, and sweated with powder and lemon juice to impart a gloss to his skin. Ormond remarked that these jockey-tricks are as common in Africa as among horse-dealers in Christian lands; and desiring me to feel the negro's pulse, I immediately detected disease or excessive excitement. In a few days I found the poor wretch, abandoned by his owner, a paralyzed wreck in the hut of a villager at Bangalang.

When a slave becomes useless to his master in the interior, or exhibits signs of failing constitution, he is soon disposed of to a peddler or broker. These men call to their aid a quack, familiar with drugs, who, for a small compensation, undertakes to refit an impaired body for the temptation of greenhorns. Sometimes the cheat is successfully effected; but experienced slavers detect it readily by the yellow eye, swollen tongue, and feverish skin.

After a few more lessons, I was considered by the Mongo sufficiently learned in the slave traffic to be intrusted with the sole management of his stores. This exemption from commerce enabled him to indulge more than ever in the use of ardent spirits, though his vanity to be called "king," still prompted him to attend faithfully to all the "country palavers"—and, let it be said to his credit, his decisions were never defective in judgment or impartiality.

After I had been three months occupied in the multifarious intercourse of Bangalang and its neighbourhood, I understood the language well enough to dispense with the interpreter, who was one of the Mongo's confidential agents. When my companion departed on a long journey, he counselled me to make up with Unga-golah, the harem's Cerberus, as she suspected my intimacy with Esther, who would doubtless be denounced to Ormond, unless I purchased the beldame's silence.

Indeed, ever since the night of warning, when the beautiful quarteronne visited my hovel, I had contrived to meet this charming girl, as the only solace of my solitude. Amid all the wild, passionate, and savage surroundings of Bangalang, Esther—the Pariah—was the only golden link that still seemed to bind me to humanity and the lands beyond the seas. On that burning coast, I was not excited by the stirring of an adventurous life, nor was my young heart seduced and bewildered by absorbing avarice. Many a night, when the dews penetrated my flesh, as I looked towards the west, my soul shrank from the selfish wretches around me, and went off in dreams to the result, because I learned from the captain that the invoice of cigars was a malicious trick, palmed off on the Aerostatico's owners by her captain in order to thwart or embarrass me, when he heard I was to be intrusted with the purchase of a cargo on the coast.

At the appointed day, La Fortuna sailed with 220 human beings packed in her hold. Three months afterwards, I received advices that she safely landed 217 in the bay of Matanzas, and that their sale yielded a clear profit on the voyage of forty-one thousand four hundred and thirty-eight dollars.*

An African factor of fair repute is ever careful to select his human cargo with consummate prudence, so as not only to supply his employers with athletic labourers, but to avoid any taint of disease that may affect the slaves in their transit to Cuba or the American main. Two days before embarkation, the head of every male and female is neatly shaved; and, if the cargo belongs to several owners, each man's brand is impressed on the body of his respective negro. This operation is performed with pieces of silver wire, or small irons fashioned into the merchant's initials, heated just hot enough to blister without burning the skin. When the entire cargo is the venture of but one proprietor, the branding is always dispensed with.

On the appointed day, the barracoon or slave-pen is made joyous by the abundant "feed" which signalises the negro's last hours in his native country. The feast over, they are taken alongside the vessel in canoes; and as they touch the deck, they are entirely stripped, so that women as well as men go out of Africa as they came into it—naked. This precaution, it will be understood, is indispensable; for perfect nudity, during the whole voyage, is the only means of securing cleanliness and health. In this state, they are immediately ordered below, the men to the hold and the women to the cabin, while boys and girls are, day and night, kept on deck, where their sole protection from the elements is a sail in fair weather, and a tarpaulin in foul.

At meal time they are distributed in messes of ten. Thirty years ago, when the Spanish slave trade was lawful, the captains were somewhat more ceremoniously religious than at present, and it was then a universal habit to make the gangs say grace before meat, and give thanks afterwards. In our days, however, they dispense with this ritual, and content themselves with a "Viva la Habana," or "hurrah for Havana," accompanied by a clapping of hands.

This over, a bucket of salt water is served to each mess, by way of "finger glasses" for the ablution of hands, after which a kidd—either of rice, farina, yams, or beans, according to the tribal habit of the negroes—is placed before the squad. In order to prevent greediness or inequality in the appropriation of nourishment, the process is performed by signals from a monitor, whose motions indicate when the darkies shall dip and when they shall swallow.

It is the duty of a guard to report immediately whenever a slave refuses to eat, in order that his abstinence may be traced to stubbornness or disease. Negroes have sometimes been found in slavers who attempted voluntary starvation; so that when the watch reports the patient to be shamming, his appetite is stimulated by the medical antidote of a cat. If the slave, however, is truly ill, he is forthwith ticketed for the sick-list by a bead or button around his neck, and dispatched to an infirmary in the forecastle.

These meals occur twice daily—at ten in the morning and four in the afternoon—and are terminated by another ablution. Thrice in each twenty-four hours they are served with half a pint of water. Pipes and tobacco are circulated economically among both sexes; but as each negro cannot be allowed the luxury of a separate bowl, boys are sent round with an adequate supply, allowing a few whiffs to each individual. On regular days—probably three times a week—their mouths are carefully rinsed with vinegar, while, nearly every morning, a dram is given as an antidote to scurvy.

Although it is found necessary to keep the sexes apart, they are allowed to converse freely during day while on deck. Corporal punishment is never inflicted save by order of an officer, and even then, not until the culprit understands exactly why it is done. Once a week, the ship's barber scrapes their chins without assistance from soap; and on the same day their nails are closely pared, to insure security from harm in those nightly battles that occur, when the slave contests with his neighbour every inch of plank to which he is glued. During afternoons of serene weather, men, women, girls, and boys are allowed to unite in African melodies, which they always enhance by an extemporaneous tom-tom on the bottom of a tub or tin kettle.

The greatest care, compatible with safety, is taken of a negro's health and cleanliness on the voyage. In every well-conducted slaver, the captain, officers, and crew, are alert and vigilant to preserve the cargo. It is their personal interest, as well as the interest of humanity, to do so. The boatswain is incessant in his patrol of purification, and disinfecting substances are plenteously distributed. The upper deck is washed and swabbed daily; the slave deck is scraped and holystoned; and, at nine o'clock each morning, the captain inspects every part of his craft; so that no vessel, except a man-of-war, can compare with a slaver in systematic order, purity, and neatness. I am not aware that the ship-fever, which sometimes decimates the emigrants from Europe, has ever prevailed in these African traders.

At sundown, the process of stowing the slaves for the night is begun. The second mate and boatswain descend into the hold, whip in hand, and range the slaves in their regular places; those on the right side of the vessel facing forward and lying in each other's lap, while those on the left are similarly stowed with their faces towards the stern. In this way each negro lies on his right side, which is considered preferable for the action of the heart. In allotting places, particular attention is paid to size, the taller being selected for the greatest breadth of the vessel, while the shorter and younger are lodged near the bows. When the cargo is large and the lower deck crammed, the supernumeraries are disposed of on deck, which is securely covered with boards to shield them from moisture. The strict discipline of nightly stowage is of the greatest importance in slavers, else every negro would accommodate himself as if he were a passenger.

In order to insure perfect silence and regularity during the night, a slave is chosen as constable from every ten, and furished with a cat to enforce commands during his appointed watch. In remuneration for his services, which are admirably performed whenever the whip is required, he is adorned with an old shirt or tarry trowsers. Now and then, billets of wood are distributed among the sleepers, but this luxury is never granted until the good temper of the negroes is ascertained, for slaves have often been tempted to mutiny by the power of arming themselves with these pillows from the forest.

It is very probable that many of my readers will consider it barbarous to make slaves lie down naked upon a board, but let me inform them that native Africans are not familiar with the use of feather-beds, nor do any but the free and rich in their mother country indulge in the luxury even of a mat or raw-hide. Among the Mandingo chiefs—the most industrious and civilized of Africans—the beds, divans, and sofas, are heaps of mud, covered with untanned skins for cushions, while logs of wood serve for bolsters. I am of opinion, therefore, that emigrant slaves experience very slight inconvenience in lying down on the deck.

But ventilation is carefully attended to. The hatches and bulkheads of every slaver are grated, and apertures are cut about the deck for ampler circulation of air. Wind-sails, too, are constantly pouring a steady draft into the hold, except during a chase, when every comfort is temporarily sacrificed for safety. During calms or in light and baffling winds, when the suffocating air of the tropics makes ventilation impossible, the gratings are always removed, and portions of the slaves allowed to repose at night on deck, while the crew is armed to watch the sleepers.

Handcuffs are rarely used on shipboard. It is the common custom to secure slaves in the barracoons, and while shipping, by chaining ten in a gang; but as these platoons would be extremely inconvenient at sea, the manacles are immediately taken off and replaced by leg-irons, which fasten them in pairs by the feet. Shackles are never used but for full-grown men, while women and boys are set at liberty as soon as they embark. It frequently happens that when the behaviour of male slaves warrants their freedom, they are released from all fastenings long before they arrive. Irons are altogether dispensed with on many Brazilian slavers, as negroes from Anjuda, some time afterwards. My infancy was spent upon the floor, in a rough cradle, or sometimes in my mother's arms; my early boyhood, in playing with the other boys and girls, colored and white, in the yard, and occasionally doing such little matters of labor as one of so young years could. I knew no difference between myself and the white children; nor did they seem to know any in turn. Sometimes my master would come out and give a biscuit to me, and another to one of his own white boys; but I did not perceive the difference between us. I had no brothers or sisters, but there were other colored families living in the same kitchen, and the children playing in the same yard, with me and my mother.

2. Slave's attempts to purchase freedom.

When I was ten or eleven years old, my master set me regularly to cutting wood, in the yard, in the winter, and working in the garden in the summer. And when I was fifteen years of age, he gave me the care of the pleasure horses, and made me his carriage driver; but this did not exempt me from other labor, especially in the summer. Early in the morning I used to take his three horses to the plantation, and turn them into the pasture to graze, and myself into the cotton or cornfield, with a hoe in my hand, to work through the day; and after sunset I would take these horses back to the city, a distance of three miles, feed them, and then attend to any other business my master or any of his family had for me to do, until bed time, when, with my blanket in my hand, I would go into the dining room to rest through the night. The next day the same round of labor would be repeated, unless some of the family wished to ride out, in which case I must be on hand with the horses to wait upon them, and in the meantime to work about the yard. On Sunday I had to drive to church twice, which, with other things necessary to be done, took the whole day. So my life went wearily on from day to day, from night to night, and from week to week.

When I began to work, I discovered the difference between myself and my master's white children. They began to order me about, and were told to do so by my master and mistress. I found, too, that they had learned to read, while I was not permitted to have a book in my hand. To be in the possession of anything written or printed, was regarded as an offence. And then there was the fear that I might be sold away from those who were dear to me, and conveyed to the far south. I had learned, that, being a slave, I was subject to this worst (to us) of all calamities; and I knew of others in similar situations to myself, thus sold away. My friends were not numerous; but in proportion as they were few they were dear; and the thought that I might be separated from them forever, was like that of having nearest plantation (I knew but little about the rest,) was a very cruel man; in one instance, as it was said among the slaves, he whipped a man to death; but of course he denied that the man died in consequence of the whipping. Still it was the choice of my wife to pass into the hands of Mr. Smith, as she had become attached to him in consequence of belonging to the same church, and receiving his religious instruction and counsel as her class-leader, and in consequence of the peculiar devotedness to the cause of religion for which he was noted, and which he always seemed to manifest. But when she became his slave, he withheld both from her and her children the needful food and clothing, while he exacted from them to the uttermost all the labor they were able to perform. Almost every article of clothing worn either by my wife or children, especially every article of much value, I had to purchase; while the food he furnished the family amounted to less than a meal a day, and that of the coarser kind. I have no remembrance that he ever gave us a blanket, or any other article of bedding, although it is considered a rule at the south that the master shall furnish each of his slaves with one blanket a year. So that, both as to food and clothing, I had in fact to support both my wife and the children, while he claimed them as his property, and received all their labor. She was a house servant to Mr. Smith, sometimes cooked the food for his family, and usually took it from the table; but her mistress was so particular in giving it out to be cooked, or so watched it, that she always knew whether it was all returned; and when the table was cleared away, the stern old lady would sit by and see that every dish (except the very little she would send into the kitchen,) was put away, and then she would turn the key upon it, so as to be sure her slaves should not die of gluttony. This practise is common with some families in that region, but with others it is not. It was not so in that of her less pious master, Mr. Boylan, nor was it precisely so at my master's. We used to have corn bread enough, and some meat. When I was a boy, the pot-liquor, in which the meat was boiled for the "great house," together with some little corn-meal balls that had been thrown in just before the meat was done, was poured into a tray and set in the middle of the yard, and a clam-shell or pewter spoon given to each of us children, who would fall upon the delicious fare as greedily as pigs. It was not generally so much as we wanted, consequently it was customary for some of the white persons who saw us from the piazza of the house where they were sitting, to order the more stout and greedy ones to eat slower, that those more young and feeble might have a chance. But it was not so with Mr. Smith; such luxuries were more than he could afford, kind and Christian man as he was considered to be. So that by the expense of providing for my wife and children, all the money I had earned, and could earn, by my night labor, was consumed, till I found myself reduced to five dollars, and this I lost one day in going to the plantation. My light of hope now went out. My prop seemed to have given way from under me. Sunk in the very night of despair respecting my freedom, I discovered myself, as though I had never known it before, a husband, the father of two children, a family looking up to me for bread, and I a slave, penniless, and well watched by my master, his wife, and his children, lest I should, perchance, catch the friendly light of the stars to make something in order to supply the cravings of nature in those with whom my soul was bound up; or lest some plan of freedom might lead me to trim the light of diligence after the day's labor was over, while the rest of the world were enjoying the hours in pleasure or sleep.

At this time an event occurred, which, while it cast a cloud over the prospects of some of my fellow slaves, was a rainbow over mine. My master died; and his widow, by the will, became sole executrix of his property. To the surprise of all, the bank of which he had been cashier, presented a claim against the estate for forty thousand dollars. By a compromise, this sum was reduced to twenty thousand dollars; and my mistress, to meet the amount, sold some of her slaves, and hired out others. I hired my time of her,* for which I paid her a price varying from one hundred dollars to one hundred and twenty dollars per year. This was a privilege which comparatively few slaves at the south enjoy; and in this I felt truly blessed.

I commenced the manufacture of pipes and tobacco on an enlarged scale. I opened a regular place of business, labelled my tobacco in a conspicuous manner with the names of "Edward and Lunsford Lane," and of some of the persons who sold it for me,—establishing agencies for the sale in various parts of the state, one at Fayetteville, one at Salisbury, one at Chapel Hill, and so on,—sold my articles from my place of business, and about town, also deposited them in stores on commission; and thus, after paying my mistress for my time, and rendering such support as was necessary to my family,

*It is contrary to the laws of the state for a slave to have command of his own time in this way, but in Raleigh it is sometimes winked at. I knew one slave-man, who was doing well for himself, taken up by the public authorities and hired out for the public good, three times in succession, for this offence. The time of hiring in such a case is one year. The master is subject to a fine. But generally, as I have said, if the slave is orderly, and appears to be making nothing, neither he nor the master is interfered with.

I found in the space of some six or eight years, that I had collected the sum of one thousand dollars. During this time I had found it politic to go shabbily dressed, and to appear to be very poor, but to pay my mistress for my services promptly. I kept my money hid, never venturing to put out a penny, nor to let any body but my wife know that I was making any. The thousand dollars was what I supposed my mistress would ask for me, and so I determined now what I would do.

I went to my mistress and inquired what was her price for me. She said a thousand dollars. I then told her that I wanted to be free, and asked her if she would sell me to be made free. She said she would; and accordingly I arranged with her, and with the master of my wife, Mr. Smith, already spoken of, for the latter to take my money* and buy of her my freedom, as I could not legally purchase it, and as the laws forbid emancipation, except for "meritorious services." This done, Mr. Smith endeavored to emancipate me formally, and to get my manumission recorded; I tried also; but the court judged that I had done nothing "meritorious," and so I remained, nominally only, the slave of Mr. Smith for a year; when, feeling unsafe in that relation, I accompanied him to New York, whither he was going to purchase goods, and was there regularly and formally made a freeman, and there my manumission was recorded. I returned to my family in Raleigh, and endeavored to do by them as a freeman should. I had known what it was to be a slave, and I knew what it was to be free.

* Legally, my money belonged to my mistress; and she could have taken it and refused to grant me my freedom. But she was a very kind woman for a slave owner; and she would under the circumstances scorn to do such a thing. I have known of slaves, however, served in this way.

But I am going too rapidly over my story. When the money was paid to my mistress and the conveyance fairly made to Mr. Smith, I felt that I was free. And a queer and a joyous feeling it is to one who has been a slave. I cannot describe it, only it seemed as though I was in heaven. I used to lie awake whole nights in thinking of it. And oh, the strange thoughts that passed through my soul, like so many rivers of light; deep and rich were their waves as they rolled;—these were more to me than sleep, more than soft slumber after long months of watching over the decaying, fading frame of a friend, and the loved one laid to rest in the dust. But I cannot describe my feelings to those who have never been slaves; then why should I attempt it? He who has passed from spiritual death to life, and received the witness within his soul that his sins are forgiven, may possibly form some distant idea, like the ray of the setting

GEORGIA CODE, ANNOTATED (1935)

Chapter and Section
2	CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA
5002	(Article VII, Finance, Taxation, etc.) Paragraph II. EXEMPTIONS. -- The General Assembly may, by law, exempt from taxation all public property; places of religious worship or burial; all institutions of purely public charity; all buildings erected for and used as a college, incorporated academy, or other seminary of learning, and also all funds or property held or used as endowment by such colleges, incorporated academies or seminaries of learning, provided the same is not invested in real estate; and provided, further, that said exemptions shall only apply to such colleges, incorporated academies or other seminaries of learning as are open to the general public; provided, further, that all endowments to institutions established for white people shall be limited to white people, and all endowments to institutions established for colored people shall be limited to colored people. . . .
	92-201 (998) of Code contains same provisions.
53/312	"WHITE PERSON" DEFINED. -- The term "white person" shall include only persons of the white or Caucasian race, who have no ascertainable trace of either Negro, African, West Indian, Asiatic Indian, Mongolian, Japanese, or Chinese blood in their veins. No person, any one of whose ancestors has been duly registered with the State Bureau of Vital Statistics as a colored person or person of color, shall be deemed to be a white person. (Acts 1927, p. 277)
79/103	PERSONS OF COLOR, WHO ARE. -- All Negroes, mulattoes, mestizos, and their descendants, having any ascertainable trace of either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in their veins, and all descendants of any person having either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in his or her veins, shall be known in this State as persons of color. Dear League Member:

Numerous inquiries have come to this office as to what action the League expects to take at this critical moment in Georgia's history.

The League as an organization must maintain its non-partisan position. A member must act in her individual capacity. The Board of the Georgia League strongly urges every member (except those who hold official League positions) immediately to express themselves publicly on either side as to their stand in the gubernatorial controversy. The Board urges you to get your friends to do the same.

Let Hon. Herman Talmadge, Hon. Ellis Arnall, your representatives, and newspapers know your position in this matter.

This is a time for action.

Yours truly,

Beatrice H. Haas

GEORGIA LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS
317 Trust Company of Georgia Building, Atlanta 3, Georgia
January 17, 1947

Listed below are three important roll call votes leading up to the present situation in the state government of Georgia.

The first vote was a trial vote and is considered by some as the most important as they believe the winning group on this vote attracted in subsequent voting the votes of those who had not fully made up their minds. The vote was 128 to 126.

The second vote listed is a vote which was taken immediately after a resolution which would have declared that the General Assembly could not elect a governor was defeated. The second vote listed was a vote that the General Assembly proceed immediately to elect a governor. (The question now before the courts is whether they had the right to elect the governor.) The vote was 137-114.

The third vote was the vote for Mr. Talmadge for governor. The nominations were closed after Mr. Talmadge had been nominated and the presiding officer instructed the legislators to vote for Mr. Talmadge by saying "Talmadge" and to vote against him by saying "Present". Vote 161-87.

Talmadge leaders urged defeat; Thompson leaders urged its passage.)	Vote II (Resolution that the Gen. Assembly proceed immediately to elect a governor. Introduced by Talmadge leader.) Highlights of Business Activity

Prices Up, Production Down

Predictions were freely made during the first half of 1947 that a recession could be expected sometime during the latter part of the year. More recently, this sentiment has given way to a stoic belief that inflationary forces are still at work, and that essential adjustments in the country's economy will be delayed.

Business indexes of economic activity for both Georgia and the United States reflect no serious slackening in the physical production and movement of commodities. On the accompanying chart, an average of several major indexes, with the effects of price increases eliminated. indicates a decline during the spring and summer months. But in general, no serious slackening has developed in either demand or the physical movements of goods, and prices of most commodities have continued to move upward.

United States Industrial production of goods throughout 1947 has remained above the same months of 1946 although the Federal Reserve Board Index of Industrial Production has gradually fallen from its Post-war Peak of 190 in March to 178 in July. Increases in automobiles and other durable goods have been particularly prominent, although textiles and many soft goods have reflected significant declines. Freight car loadings have consistently stayed at a high level. On the other hand, construction contracts are considerably less than a year ago, and retail sales, when price changes are eliminated, are down.

Georgia Available indexes on Georgia activity, when summarized, also reflect a generally favorable situation. A downward trend has developed in the textile industry during the summer. Cotton consumption in the state fell from an index of 184 (based on the 1935-39 average) in January to 120 in July. Lumber production was 40 per cent above pre-war for the first 4 months of 1947, but has since fallen by about 15 per cent. Employment continues at a high rate, with a definite scarcity of qualified construction workers in most localities throughout the State.

Department store sales, as reported by the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank, have generally been higher in dollar value for 1947 than for corresponding months of 1946. But when adjustments are made for retail price rises in the past year, volume sales have consistently been less in 1947 than in 1946.

Prices and the Cost of Living

Trend Continues Upward in Spite of Wistful Predictions and Verbal Threats

Expectations of a decline in prices and cost of living have failed to materialize. Even after the phenomenal price rise of 1946 after price controls were lifted, the general trend throughout 1947 has been upward.

Prices

Between June and December 1946, retail prices according to the U. S. Department of Commerce's Retail Price Index rose 17 percent. By July 1947, the increase amounted to 22 percent—80 percent above pre-war.

Wholesale prices rose even faster—28 percent from June to December 1946, and 37 percent by August 1947—90 percent above the pre-war average. Building materials, grain, and foods led the rise.

Cost Of Living

Estimates of the cost of living by the Bureau of Labor Statistics have risen slightly less than retail and wholesale prices—the July 1947, index was 19 percent higher than June 1946. This lower rise results primarily from the fact that rents are still under controls. The most rapid increase occurred between June and December 1946, with an average rise of 15 percent for the United States.

Georgia

In Georgia estimates of cost of living are available only for Atlanta and Savannah. In both cities the rise has been higher than for the United States, as shown on the accompying chart. This more rapid increase is a result of a lower pre-war price base, rather than of more expensive living costs.

Food

Food costs have led the price rise. During the last half of 1946, food prices increased by more than one-fourth. The rise in food prices in 1947, as shown on the chart, has been much slower than during the latter part of 1946, but no indication of a break in prices has developed.

Meat and dairy products have led the food price rise. From an index of 134 in June 1946, the retail price of meat jumped to 204 in November, to 217 in June 1947, and has steadily risen. Wholesale prices of meat have increased even more than retail prices, approximately doubling between June 1946, and the summer of 1947.

Current Situation

Based on supply prospects, shortages continue to exist for many durable goods such as automobiles, but adequate supplies of textiles and other soft goods are available at existing prices. Considerable sales resistance toward the purchase of many items existed throughout the first half of 1947 as indicated by the decline in the physical volume of retail sales. Against this trend, several general inflationary events are still operating. Notable among these are the cash payment for terminal leave bonds of military personnel, expanded foreign loans and purchases, and the increased cost of certain specific raw materials, such as coal and steel.

Industrial Employment Trends in Georgia

Current Industrial Employment Exceeds 600,000

By Harris P. Dawson, Regional Director, U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, Atlanta

No discussion of recent employment trends in Georgia would be complete without reference to the experiences of the war years. The state is just now recovering from the great shifts in employment which occurred during the war and immediately thereafter, and as a result, the employment patterns of the future promise to be substantially different from the prewar patterns. Processes invented during the war, the utilization of certain war plants, the newly acquired skills of Georgia workers, all have had their effects. Moreover, Georgia workers have also become accustomed to higher wages, and less enthusiastically, to higher prices, and they will naturally resist any backward movement of wage rates.

During, and since the war, employment in Georgia's non-agricultural industries (both manufacturing and non-manufacturing) has stood at a level much higher than that of 1939. The peak was reached in 1943 when total employment in the state averaged 666,000 workers or about 35 percent greater than in 1939. The current level of non-agricultural employment is in the neighborhood of 608,000, or over 20 percent higher than in the pre-war period.

Wartime Expansion Mainly In manufacturing

In keeping with the wartime demands, and paralleling the general trend over the nation, Georgia manufacturing industries between 1942 and 1945 took on more new workers than did the non-manufacturing industries, such as trades, services and finance. After one year of America's direct participation in the war (January 1943), manufacturing employment in Georgia had risen by about 50 percent over the 1939 level to a total of 288,700 workers, as compared with an increase of 47 percent for the other southeastern states and 65 percent for the nation as a whole. The state's wartime employment peak came in November 1943, when manufacturing industries employed 314,400 persons, a 63 percent rise from the 1939 level.

Chart by H. Q. Avera

Again, even at this peak, Georgia's increase in manufacturing employment did not come up to the national average of a 76 percent increase. Nevertheless, Georgia's expansion during the war, percentagewise, was more than any of the other southern states, with the exception of Alabama, Florida and Mississippi, where heavy industries and shipbuilding showed large increases. Among the southeastern states Georgia has ranked second, with North Carolina first, in manufacturing employment for a number of years.

The over-all increase in manufacturing employment to the peak in 1943, was the result of two general movements in manufacturing employment which did not exactly coincide. First in order of time, were significant increases in industries, such as textiles, apparel and lumber, which were important in peacetime and whose products were equally important to the war but which could be transferred to war needs without extensive product changes or plant alterations. Army duck, cloth for dungarees, and yarn for Navy T-shirts required little change from peacetime specifications, and the pine boards which went into Army barracks were cut in the same manner as the boards which formerly went into homes.

War-Born Industries

The second movement concerns the strictly war-born industries, such as shipbuilding, aircraft and shell loading which required a longer period of time in which to get into production. Plants had to be built and production lines set up before large numbers of workers could be employed. However when these industries finally went into production, there were not enough workers to man all of Georgia's plants, and adjustments within the state's industries became necessary. Gradually through inducement of higher wages in war plants, through War Manpower Commission directives and recruiting policies, through special treatment in draft deferments, workers were shifted from textiles, apparels and lumber into shipbuilding and aircraft. As a result war industries reached their peak employment levels after the non-durable industries started declining.

Textiles

To illustrate, Georgia's textile industry, which employed about 45 percent of all manufacturing workers in 1939, reached its peak early in the war months, and by the time war production had reached its height, had started to lose employees to higher paying industries. Textile mills lost employees steadily, with minor exceptions, from November 1942 to September 1945. At that time, however, the total employment in this group—94,600—was still 7 percent above 1939, and at the peak of war production, textiles still employed 35 percent of all Georgia's industrial workers. In like manner the lumber industry doubled its employment from 1939 to 1943 but declined steadily thereafter to the end of the war.

Aircraft

On the other hand, the transportation equipment industries—shipbuilding and aircraft—which were practically nonexistent in Georgia until the early part of 1942—were employing 25,000 workers by January 1943, and continued to increase month-by-month until the wartime high of 58,600 was reached in March 1944. For the entire year of 1944 employment in this group remained above 55,000, but by February 1945 most of the demands for ships and aircraft had been met and employment had begun to decline. By August 1945, just prior to V-J Day, employment had dropped to 38,800. Immediately following V-J Day, cut-backs and contract cancellations lowered the industry's employment to 21,700. Further reductions followed until by March 1947 the industry had settled down to its pre-war level of less than 2,000 workers. Similarly iron and steel, ordnance and machinery, although never important in the state, obtained their highest employment levels in 1944 and declined sharply after V-J Day.

Post-War Recovery

An analysis of more recent trends indicates the current stage of the state's employment cycle. As would be expected, the non-manufacturing industries were able to start a slow and gradual recovery after V-J Day. A steady expansion of employment in Georgia's textile industry occurred from October 1945 through February 1947, thus regaining a large part of the decline which occurred during the latter war years. However, since the first of this year the industry has lost over 5,000 workers bringing the current level to 103,100. A part of this recent decline may be attributed to certain adjustments normally to be expected following a period of intense activity. These adjustments include improved worker efficiency as a result of better training and more selective hiring policies on the part of the mills, the return of older and more experienced workers, and finally the replacing of older equipment with new and more modern machines in many mills.

New Manufacturing Plants To Open

The press has widely heralded the opening of new plants in Georgia. This is most encouraging, but as yet the full effects on employment of these new plants cannot be traced. Many of them are still under construction and have employed no production workers. Others have not yet started construction. Moreover, many of the new enterprises are small and are merely replacing the small businesses which went out of operation during the war. On the other hand, others represent genuine additions to the state's economy. Fortunately most of the new establishments are in well tried lines, with a minimum of speculative enterprises. Some of the new plants are in the apparel industry. The expansion of the Chicopee Manufacturing Company's Lumite Plants are paralleling lines already known here. Others such as Ford, General Motors, and Sherwin-Williams plants near Atlanta represent the decentralization of old companies, which have carefully chosen Georgia from a number of possible locations.

Diversification Still Needed

While the establishment of each new plant is most encouraging, one point should not be forgotten. In appraising the employment prospects in Georgia it should be remembered that today two industries, textiles and lumber, still employ over one-half of all manufacturing workers in the state; if four more groups are included—apparel, food processing, furniture and chemicals—82 percent of all manufacturing employment is accounted for. Thus, while percentage-wise the South and Georgia are making definite progress in industrial employment expansion, the simple truth is that its growth extends from a narrow base, and lack of diversification is still a weakness in the state's economy.

Tax Reform in Georgia

Past Progress has been Sporatic and Slow

By R. P. Brooks, Professor of Economics
College of Business Adminstration, University of Georgia

In the last session of the General Assembly a resolution was passed requiring the Governor to create a Commission on Tax Revision. Acting Governor Thompson appointed the Commission in March of this year, and in May the Commission held its first meeting. All citizens who have the interests of Georgia at heart stand ready to aid the Commission in its work and look forward eagerly to its final report next year.

Economic progress and an enlightened tax system are recognized as being mutually related. A tax system which encourages the establishment of new industries, the adoption of modern improvements in agriculture, forestry, and manufacturing, is desired by each locality and state. With rapid economic changes, continuous revisions in the tax structure are essential if the tax system is to encourage rather than retard progress.

In view of the present widespread interest in revamping the tax system of Georgia, as exemplified by acts of the last General Assembly in creating a special tax commission, Georgia Business will present analyses of phases of the Georgia tax structure from time to time by recognized tax authorities. This article presenting a chronological review of past efforts is the first of a series. Editor.

Members of the Commission know that in the past the General Assembly has for the most part failed to follow the recommendations of State tax revision committees and that years usually elapse before desirable changes suggested by the Commissions are enacted into law. Recommendations made by individual competent students of taxation usually have met the same fate. Some cases in point may be cited.

Tax Commission Of 1918

In 1918 the General Assembly passed a bill creating a Special Tax Commission composed of two Senators, three members of the House, and three businessmen. The Commission was an able one and was composed of men who were generally regarded as sound students of taxation in Georgia, including Dr. J. H. T. McPherson of the University of Georgia, and Dr. Edgar H. Johnson of Emory. After ten months study the Commission rendered its report. (Report of the Special Tax Commission, Byrd Printing Company, Atlanta, 1919). It concentrated upon the familiar evils of the general property tax, such as the failure to get on the books great quantities of legally taxable property, the competitive undervaluation practiced by counties in order to lessen their contribution to the State Treasury, the individual inequalities within counties, the scandalous way in which intangibles were escaping taxes. As a remedy for this situation, the Commission advocated a constitutional amendment to end the uniform ad valorem system and permit classification. It further recommended the complete reorganization of the administration of taxes and the setting up of a State Tax Commission with power to enforce the law; and finally it recommended an income tax as the fairest of all impositions. The General Assembly at that time disregarded the Report.

The City Club of Atlanta had a standing Committee on Taxation, the Chairman of which was Mr. Walter McElreath. That Committee in 1923 prepared an excellent Report, Taxation in Georgia; Analysis of Revenues and Expenditures by Counties; Discussion of Proposed Changes. The Committee opposed the current agitation for the abandonment of the ad valorem tax for State revenue and advocated the adoption of a sales tax, an income tax, an occupation tax, and an inheritance tax. The City Club of Atlanta was, of course, a private enterprize and was actuated in its study by a laudable desire to align the leading business elements on the side of tax reform.

In 1925 Governor Clifford Walker appointed a notable Committee on Taxation consisting of twenty leading citizens under the chairmanship of Eugene R. Black, later Governor of the Federal Reserve System, and including such outstanding businessmen as Mr. T. K. Glenn, President of the Trust Company of Georgia, and Harold Hirsch, both of Atlanta; Mr. M. B. Lane, President of Citizens and Southern Bank, and Mr. T. M. Cunningham, both of Savannah; Mr. W. C. Bradley of Columbus; and Mr. W. R. Vereen of Moultrie. This committee presented its Report in July, 1925.

The Report endorsed the findings of the Tax Commission of 1918. It cited the state's poor administrative machinery, pointing out that responsibility for the administration of the tax laws was shared by four separate officers in the Capitol, none of which had an adequate staff. The Committee strongly felt that a thorough-going budgeting system should be adopted. It repeated the recommendations of the earlier Commission that an income tax be imposed and that a constitutional amendment be adopted permitting classification. A complete change in assessing property for taxation was recommended. What was needed was centralized control and the elimination of competitive undervaluation; and finally the Committee denounced the allocation system. No action was taken by the General Assembly on this report.

Private Tax Studies Of 1930

Five years later in 1930, two important studies of Georgia's taxation problems were published. One of these was prepared by Mr. Malcolm Bryan, then Professor of Economics at the University of Georgia, and now Vice-Chairman of the Board of the Trust Company of Georgia. This Report, entitled The Fiscal Position of Georgia, was one of a series of monographs on business subjects prepared under the auspices of the Bureau of Business Research at the University of Georgia.

The other study was prepared by Mr. Harley L. Lutz, Professor of Pubic Finance at Princeton University, who had been employed by Governor Hardman to undertake the work.

These studies, made independently, were thorough and excellent. They agreed in advocating an income tax but disapproved the pending income tax amendment as being inadequate. They both denounced the then prevalent system of allocating various tax receipts to specific purposes (62 percent of the revenue of Georgia at that time was disposed of without legislative appropriation). Both scholars argued strongly against the abandonment of the ad valorem tax for state purposes.

Lutz favored a classification amendment, but Bryan did not discuss the point. Lutz devoted a considerable part of his study to analyzing the General Tax Act, pointing out many absurdities. He reserved his severest condemnation for the poor administration of the tax system, again recommending the creation of a State Tax Commission and the consolidation of the scattered administration units under one body with adequate power; and he strongly advocated state control of local fiscal affairs. Neither authority took any definite stand in the matter of a Sales Tax although Lutz thought the gross receipts tax of 1929 (which expired in 1931) a very poor piece of legislation. Neither of these excellent studies resulted in legislative action.

A group of Atlanta businessmen employed the writer in 1937, under the direction of Mr. Hugh Spalding, to prepare still another analysis of the state's financial situation. This comprehensive report, like its predecessors, bore no fruit.

Legislation Lags Behind Recommendations

In the past, the General Assembly has been slow to act upon the recommendations of either official or independent experts. There are always influential persons and business firms that are interested in maintaining the status quo; change is bound to affect somebody adversely. People in general prefer to endure present ills rather than take the chance of more grievous ones that might follow change. There develops a sort of vested interest in bad government.

Perhaps a more cogent explanation of the lag between recommendations and legislation is to be found in a lack of understanding of the proposed changes. Proposals made by tax commissions and by experts in the field oftentimes seem radical to average citizens. A period of public education must usually intervene, therefore, before the new idea can win the approval of the masses. It took nearly twenty years of agitation to carry into effect the recommendation of the 1918 Tax Commission that the constitution be amended to permit classification (finally adopted in 1937); a dozen years elapsed before the 1918 and 1925 recommendations of an income tax were adopted; a State Tax Commission was created in 1931, six years after Governor Walker's Committee so recommended.

Tax Legislation Of 1933

Governor Thompson's Commission therefore should be heartened by the reflection that its work may not in the long-run be in vain. Every now and then a leader arises who can carry the General Assembly along with him in reform measures. Such a leader was the present junior Senator from Georgia, who as Governor Russell held office from 1931 to 1933. He induced the General Assembly to submit to the people a Constitutional amendment permitting classification (though unfortunately the electorate turned down the amendment). The present income tax was adopted during his time; and he put over the long-awaited reorganixation of the tax administration by furthering the creation of a state revenue commission (in 1937 changed to a single State Revenue Commissioner) to consolidate the numerous offices charged with administration of the various parts of the tax system. Since Governor Russell's time no great progress in tax revision has occurred, although a number of other studies of the problem have been made.

Further Tax Studies

While progress in tax reform has been slow, studies of the states tax structure have continued. In 1938 and 1940 the Citizens' Fact-Finding Movement of Georgia printed analyses of the Revenue system— Georgia State Taxes, June, 1938; and Georgia Tax System, June, 1940. The State Revenue Commissioner, in 1944, set up an informal group of tax officials, citizens and experts, to study the entire tax system. Under sponsorship of this group, I prepared an extensive report on the Assessment of Property in Georgia and the Problem of Equalization. In May of 1946 the Institute for the Study of Georgia Problems published a comprehensive study of financial affairs of Georgia. (R. P. Brooks, Financing Government in Georgia, 1850-1944. Bulletin of the University of Georgia, May, 1946).

Legislative Act Of 1943

The most important, specific measure for improving the tax system in recent years was a legislative act of 1943 uprooting the allocations system. This requirment that all funds be paid into the State Treasury and be expended by legislative act was imbedded in the new Georgia Constitution adopted in August, 1945. Thus ended one of the major evils under which Georgia had so long suffered.

Improvement in the administration of the general property tax is currently one of the state's most pressing problems. I shall discuss this phase of the tax structure in a future issue of Georgia Business.

FROM - PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION OF VIRGINIA PERTAINING TO ELECTIONS.

Section 18. Qualifications of voters. - Every citizen of the United States, twenty-one years of age, who has been a resident of the State one Year, of the county, city, or town, six months, and of the precinct in which he offers to vote, thirty days, next preceding the election in which he offers to vote, has been registered, and has paid his State poll taxes, as hereinafter required, shall be entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people; but removal from one precinct to another, in the same county, city or town shall not deprive any person of his right to vote in the precinct from which he has moved, until the expiration of thirty days after such removal.

The right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex.

Section 20. Who may register. - Every citizen of the United States, having the qualifications of age and residence required in section eighteen, shall be entitled to register, provided:

First. That he has personally paid to the proper officer all State poll taxes legally assessed or assessable against him for the three years next preceding that in which he offers to register; or, if he came of age at such time that no poll tax shall have been assessable against him for the year preceding the year in which he offers to register, has paid one dollar and fifty cents, in satisfaction of the first year's poll tax assessable against him; and

Second. That, unless physically unable, he make application to register in his own handwriting, without aid, suggestion, or memorandum, in the presence of the registration officer, stating therein his name, age, date and place of birth, residence and occupation at the time and for the one year next preceding, and whether he has previously voted, and, if the State, county, and precinct in which he voted last; and,

Third. That he answer on oath any and all questions affecting his qualifications as an elector, submitted to him by the registration officer, which questions, and his answers thereto, shall be reduced to writing, certified by the said officer, and preserved as a part of his official records.

DIFFICULT AREAS IN ALABAMA STATE FINANCES

One year ago this publication carried two articles directed at the question of the degree of soundness in the Alabama state revenue system. The principal facts, problems, and conclusions set forth therein are still relevant, particularly:

1. Total state taxes increased from $40,358,000 in 1939 to $92,476,000 in 1947 and $106,240,000, in 1948.

2. Some taxes increased much more rapidly than others, for example: sales and use taxes from $5,948,000 in 1939 to $26,546,000 in 1947 and $32,173,000 in 1948; income from $1,812,000 in 1939 to $10,318,000 in 1947 and $12,551,000 in 1948; and tobacco, from $3,156,000 in 1939 to $7,115,000 in 1947 and $7,662,000 in 1948. On the other hand, increases in certain other taxes were nominal, e.g., property, from $5,192,000 in 1937 to $6,101,000 in 1947 and $6,616,000 in 1948; and corporation franchise taxes and permits from $1,660,000 in 1939 to $2,143,000 in 1947 and $2,205,000 in 1948.

3. In general, the special funds, particularly the Special Educational Trust Fund, received the great bulk of the increases in tax collections.

4. State, and state and local, per capita taxes stated in terms of a percentage of per capita income were much smaller in 1947 than in 1939. This means that Alabama state and local governments have shared much less than proportionately in the postwar prosperity. Are state and local governmental responsibilities also relatively less important?

5. Increases in price levels have dissipated much of the increased dollar tax collections. This is particularly true of expenditures for construction.

6. The 1947 legislature over-appropriated General Fund receipts. A deficit was avoided during the fiscal year 1948 by reducing the working capital of the state's liquor store system. Because the same expedient must be used in the current fiscal year, perhaps the situation should be spelled out in greater detail.

The Alabama liquor store system began operations without any working capital. Over the years it accumulated a total of $7,200,000 through the retention of earnings. Four million dollars of this belongs to all funds in proportion to their share in the earnings of the system. That is, 60 per cent was contributed by the General Fund, 10 per cent by the counties and 30 per cent by the municipalities. In addition, the General Fund refrained from withdrawing $3,200,000 of its share, leaving this amount with the system which accounted for it on its books as "surplus." In order to pay General Fund appropriations during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1948, it was necessary to reduce this "surplus" to $900,000. To "balance" the General Fund in the current year it will be necessary to use this remaining $900,000 and more than $1,000,000 of the $4,000,000 working capital. Since it would be manifestly unfair to permit the General Fund of the state to recapture a part of the working capital without offering the counties and municipalities an opportunity to make equivalent withdrawals, it may be anticipated that virtually all of the state liquor stores' working capital will be withdrawn.

If this almost certain eventuality materializes, and unless other sources of working capital are provided, Alabama will be operating a state merchandising business of approximately $50,000,000 annual sales under a severe handicap. Profits under conditions requiring hand-to-mouth buying, foregoing of discounts, and interest expense, naturally will be smaller than they otherwise would be. Since liquor store earnings and withdrawals of surplus currently are looked to for about one-half of General Fund receipts, it is clear that anything tending to reduce such earning may contribute to General Fund deficits in years to come.

A primary difficulty facing the 1949 legislature is one of restoring General Fund revenues to a level sufficient to meet the appropriations necessary to perform the state's services that are financed out of this fund. Since the General Fund currently is spending more than its revenue receipts, and in view of the fact that almost all agencies and departments financed by General Fund receipts are asking for larger appropriations, it is clear that the legislature has a major problem to resolve. Assuming that the legislature will refrain from making appropriations in excess of conservative estimates of receipts, it has five alternative courses of action.

1. It might hold General Fund appropriations to anticipated revenues from existing General Fund taxes and other revenue sources.

2. It might shift certain existing General Fund disbursements to other funds, e.g., fail to renew the $2,750,000 appropriations to the Special Educational Trust Fund.

3. It might add new taxes or other revenue receipts to the General Fund.

4. It might raise rates on existing General Fund taxes.

5. It might redistribute existing taxes giving the General Fund a larger share at the expense of special funds.

Perhaps a sixth point should be added. The legislature might implement point number one by running away from the problem of providing adequate revenues by reducing absolute appropriations and increasing contingent appropriations, i.e., those payable if funds are available. This would not necessarily be bad. If point number one should prove politically impossible, the better thing to do might be to avoid prorations by using the device of the contingency appropriation.[1]

Present indications are that the legislature either will overappropriate the General Fund or will fail to provide much additional revenue thus holding appropriations to absurdly low levels in terms of present day costs and governmental services demanded. Neither action will settle the problem. Indeed, the General Fund problem appears insoluble in terms of the actions of any one session of the legislature. Alternatives two to five above appear politically unpalatable under present conditions of threatened recession and genuine need of more revenue by services financed out of special funds. This is not to say, however, that the next session of the legislature can do nothing constructive to contribute to the solution of the problem of the General Fund and also to the problems of all state services financed out of special funds. On the contrary, the legislature can set in motion certain programs which will go a long way to resolve the state's fiscal problems. Among the more important elements in such a program are:

1. Take the necessary action to establish an adequate budget system. Every operating division of the state should be subjected to the control of quarterly allotments and the budget office should be staffed with at least five competent examiners who would become thoroughly acquainted with the problems, procedures, and requirements of each operating division. Further, the legislature should make definite appropriations for specific services and objects from each special fund. Until this is done it is unrealistic to hold the Governor responsible for the efficient operation of each department and agency; also the legislature scarcely can hope to possess the detail of information and understanding necessary to judge the appropriations needed to achieve the state's objectives.

2. Take necessary action to establish a capital outlay budget. The present revenue system allows too little for capital improvements for all functions including highway construction. It does not appear likely that the improvements demanded for schools, hospitals, roads, etc. can be financed without considerable borrowing. Much preliminary work remains to be done in inventorying capital needs and in developing the details of financing and timing such a program.

3. Initiate action toward improving assessment and equalization of the property tax. This tax is grossly underused in Alabama in comparison with other areas; its administration permits wholesale evasions and extreme inequalities of several different types. The only real hope of the municipalities to obtain sufficient additional local revenues to meet their demands for services and retain a reasonable claim to the privilege of "home rule," lies in restoring the integrity and productivity of the property tax. A sensible first step in this direction is to direct the Department of Revenue to work out the details of a program of state-wide reassessment, installation of modern assessment systems, training and supervision of local assessing officials and continuing state-wide equalization. A succeeding legislature should follow through on such a program.

4. Take steps leading to the eventual abolition of earmarking of revenue receipts except for true trust funds. In making this point the writer recognizes full well the difficulties and dangers involved. The propensity of Alabama legislatures to levy taxes for special designated purposes only is old and deep-seated. An explanation of this traditional practice undoubtedly would be complex but some of the more important causes would include: irresponsible accounting and budgeting prior to 1932; comparative poverty in the past which means that new taxes appeared quite burdensome and difficult to sell except for specific services of great popular interest; and, until recently, a general reluctance to accord government an important role in the development of the state. It is easily understandable that succeeding legislatures succumbed to the temptation to permit worthy pressure groups to lead the fight for new taxes and that such groups should feel a proprietary interest in such taxes after they had carried the brunt of the battle.

First, some facts as to the extent and character of earmarking will be presented; then a brief note on the reasons it should be abolished.

Tables 1 and 2 are offered as indicative of the facts.

Gross disbursements	22,592	266,900
Disbursement transfers	5,287	93,586
Net disbursements	17,305	173,271

The comparative unimportance of the General Fund as shown in Table 1 is overstated to some degree because the figures for both net receipts and net disbursements in the total for all funds include items which are inflationary. For example, they include gross sales and purchases of the liquor stores. The general impression given by the table is correct; almost the only thing "general" about the General Fund is its name.

Table 2 merits considerable pondering. It shows the distribution of the principal net receipts from taxes and state liquor store earnings. Tax collections in 1948 are contrasted with 1939. Clearly the General Fund tax sources are more stable in yield than are the larger special fund taxes, but they do not include any share in the big revenue producers except to the extent of expenses of collection.

The writer would like to make his attitude perfectly clear. He would not recommend abolishing earmarking if he felt that the State of Alabama (including local governments) would fail to provide much more than the present amounts for such services as education and highways. His considered

REVIEW OF BUSINESS ACTIVITY IN ALABAMA IN FEBRUARY 1949

ALABAMA business on the whole remained at a very high level in February. There were some declines in industrial activity, employment had some weak spots, and retail trade slackened somewhat—but most of these things can be thought of as symptomatic. Whether or not these are indications of only minor readjustments remains to be seen.

INDUSTRIAL activity in Alabama during February, as measured by the composite index of production in seven basic industries, declined from January. The February index was 180, a drop of 7 points from January and 11 points from February of last year. There is usually a seasonal decline from January in each of the basic industries included in the index. However, with the exception of cotton consumption and coal production, the declines were more than seasonally expected. The industrial index for the United States, as computed by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, stood at 189, a decline of 2 points from January and 5 points from February 1948.

The index of pig iron production in Alabama declined 15 points to stand at 178. Despite this decline from January, the index was 4 points above February of last year and has only been exceeded by one like month, February 1944. The steel picture was similar to that of pig iron. Although the index of steel production declined 9 points from January, output still remained high. February is the ninth consecutive month in which the steel index has been over 200 or over twice the 1935-39 average.

A drop of 18 points in the index of electric energy used for industrial purposes indicated that there were declines in other industries which are not included in the composite industrial index, but which are heavy users of electric energy.

Cotton consumed by textile mills in Alabama during February declined 5 per cent from January and 18 per cent from February 1948. The seasonally adjusted index stood at 131, an increase of 2 points over January. Cotton spindle activity (measured by average spindle hours) for February showed 367 active hours per spindle in place as compared to 411 in January and 472 in February a year ago. The average hours per spindle in place has continuously declined since August 1948 indicating a shortened work week or lay-offs of workers.

BUILDING contracts awarded in Alabama during February amounted to $12,525,000, an increase of 69 per cent over January and 61 per cent over February 1948. Value of nonresidential contracts awarded amounted to 54 per cent of the total value and was larger than any previous month since May 1948. Value of public works and utilities contracts declined 47 per cent from January and 68 per cent from February 1948, and accounted for only 10 per cent of the total value. Residential contracts awarded increased substantially over January and February of last year.

EMPLOYMENT activity in Alabama continued to be unsteady during February. Some sections of the state reported improved employment conditions, while other sections reported unfavorable conditions due to layoffs in sawmilling and lumber activity. Part of the decline in lumber and sawmilling was due to less demand for lumber products, the falling price of lumber, and bad weather during the month. Indications of improved activity were declines in job applications and claims for unemployment compensation. Unfavorable factors were declines in job placements and job openings, increased payments for unemployment compensation, and increased job applications on file.

Employment in manufacturing as estimated by the Department of Industrial Relations declined from 223,200 workers as of January 15 to 220,800 as of February 15, a loss of 2,400 workers. Principal declines were in lumber, foundries, and textiles. Employment was down 400 workers in bituminous coal mining and down 500 in government employment in Alabama.

New applications for jobs during February amounted to 14,267, a decline of 11 per cent from January but an increase of 18 per cent over February a year ago. The total number of workers at the end of February actively seeking jobs through the Employment Service amounted to 58,551, an increase of 6 per cent over the previous month. Job openings received during the month was down 11 per cent.

Total job placements amounted to 9,551, a decline of 10 per cent from January and a drop of 20 per cent from February 1948. Placements of nonagricultural workers declined 11 per cent, while those of agricultural workers were only 5 per cent less than the previous month. An unfavorable ratio of job placements to job applications continued to exist during February with 4,716 more job applications than placements.

Initial claims for unemployment compensation amounted to 14,432, a decline of 10 per cent from January claims. Payments for unemployment compensation totaled $951,129, an increase of 4 per cent during the month. All industry divisions shared in the increase with the exception of mining.

TRADE activities in February were below January in all phases except department store sales in Mobile. Department store inventory values in Birmingham and Montgomery increased. Estimated sales based on sales tax payments were $144,547,000, a decline of 5 per cent from the January level and a decline of one per cent from a year ago. Data are not available for a more detailed analysis of February sales. In January, the retail sales based on a 1 Estimate based on total retail sales tax collected. Index adjusted for seasonal only with 1938-41 average equals 100.

2 Index based on average daily sales. Per cent change based on unadjusted index.

3 Covers 17 identical associations.

4 Quarterly data only available for this city.

Sources of the data in the above table are given in the March 1948 Business News.

maximum sample of identical reporting firms dropped 25 per cent from the December level. According to the sample, significant changes in the retail sales of individual businesses included declines for food stores, 15 per cent; general merchandise stores, 50 per cent; clothing stores, 55 per cent; furniture stores, 41 per cent; miscellaneous retail trade concerns, 31 per cent; manufacturers of all machinery except electrical, 26 per cent; and an increase of 61 per cent for sales made by the manufacturers of food and kindred products.

Gasoline sales (gallons) in February declined 5 per cent from January but increased substantially over a year ago, 12 per cent. The seasonally adjusted index was virtually the same as January. Registrations (number) of all vehicles dropped 39 per cent from January; passenger car registration fell 37 per cent; trucks, 43 per cent; and all other vehicles, 80 per cent. As a composite, registrations of all vehicles were 29 per cent below a year ago.

Department store sales (dollar value) in February in Birmingham and Montgomery were 5 per cent and 4 per cent respectively below January, while sales in Mobile increased 6 per cent. Compared to a year ago, these sales declined 4 per cent in Birmingham, 6 per cent in Montgomery, and 6 per cent in Mobile. Department store inventory values increased from January 31 to February 28 by 3 per cent in Birmingham and 4 per cent in Montgomery, and were one per cent and 10 per cent respectively above February 29, 1948.

TRAFFIC over the Alabama State Docks at Mobile for the month of February totaled 243,381 tons, an increase of 9 per cent over January but a decrease of 28 per cent from February 1948. Outbound tonnage made up 51,515 tons (21 per cent) of the total while inbound products accounted for 191,866 (79 per cent). The outbound figure was 25 per cent below the previous month and 69 per cent under February 1948. However, the inbound tonnage total showed increases in comparison to both January 1949 and February 1948 of 27 per cent and 11 per cent respectively. Products of mines (bauxite, manganese ores, and large quantities of sodium nitrate) arriving at the bulk materials handling plant of the State Docks, represented over 80 per cent of all inbound tonnage. Latest figures available on imports through the Mobile Customs District are for January, with a total value of $2,082,284. The most recent tabulations of exports available were for October and November of last year, $5,903,570 and $6,962,933 respectively.

FINANCIAL indicators in February registered declines from January bank debits, savings deposits, and prices received by Alabama farmers but increases in demand deposits, mortgage recordings, consumers' price index, and insurance sales. Declines from February 1948 bank savings, postal savings, consumers' price index, and prices received by Alabama farmers were shown while bank debits, demand deposits, mortgages, and insurance sales were above the year-ago figures.

The total dollar volume of bank debits in the thirteen reporting Alabama cities, $609,949,072, was 14 per cent below the January debits but was slightly above February a year ago. A study of bank debits since 1923 in four major Alabama cities shows that February debits are usually 18 per cent below January. Demand deposits indicate the cash resources of a community readily available for use. These deposits had a balance at the end of February of $558,757,073 and were above the previous month and the year-ago balances. The savings deposits balance of $187,855,843 was one per cent below January and was 2 per cent below the year-ago figure. There has been a decline in postal savings for the past eleven consecutive months, but a slight increase over January was shown. However, the balance remained below the year-ago level. Mortgages recorded in the eleven counties reporting amounted to $18,577,497 in February and were above January and February 1948 recordings by 15 per cent and 23 per cent respectively. Ordinary life insurance sales also increased over January and the year-ago figures, the $13,344,000 total of sales being 25 per cent above January and 21 per cent above February 1948. The index of prices received by Alabama farmers declined from 257 in both December and January to 250 in February. The 17 point decline from February 1948 was due largely to the lower prices of grains, cotton, and cottonseed. The all items consumer price index for Birmingham has declined each month since August, dropping from 179 in that month to 172 in February.

CITIES in Alabama which reported during February had increases over January demand deposits, postal savings, building permits, mortgage recordings, and payments for unemployment compensation. Comparison with the year-ago figures reveals increases in bank debits, demand deposits, postal receipts, building permits, mortgages, applications for work, and claims and payments for unemployment compensation.

Attention is called to the following indicators in the various cities: the increases over January savings deposits in Anniston and over January and the year-ago savings in Birmingham; the decline from the previous month and February 1948 demand deposits, building permits, and mortgages in Decatur; the decline from January of all indicators except claims and payments for unemployment compensation in Dothan; the increase over January postal receipts in Gadsden (the only increase over January receipts shown); the improved employment situation (increased placements and declines in applications) in Huntsville and the Tri-Cities; the decline from February 1948 bank debits in Mobile and Montgomery; the increase over the year-ago bank and postal savings in Selma; and the large decline (24 per cent) from January bank debits in Tuscaloosa.

opinion is that these and other services could be more fully supported, with a fairer tax system, if earmarking were abandoned, provided certain measures were adopted to make it possible for the legislature and the administration to become truly responsible.

Earmarking hurts in several fundamental respects, particularly: 1. It prevents a balanced development of essential services which are not popularly understood and demanded. 2. It virtually precludes a genuine reform of the Alabama system of corporation and business taxation. 3. Indirectly it contributes to the progressive deterioration of the property tax as a source of local government and school district revenues. 4. It contributes to the slow development of proper budgeting as applied to many special funds.

The next session of the legislature cannot abolish earmarking outright. It certainly should not do so. The steps it might take toward this goal are: 1. to insist on modern budgetary and appropriation procedures applied to all funds; 2. to initiate property tax administrative reform; 3. to precipitate a crisis to stimulate public interest in the problem by being ruthless in holding appropriations to anticipated revenues. That is, avoid both overappropriation and the dodge of contingency appropriations. Finally, after points one and two have been successfully implemented, a general assembly two or four years hence might revise the Fletcher Budget Act to permit deficit financing in years of low revenue due to cyclical conditions. This last point is fundamental to remove the objections that, under a system requiring that the budget be "balanced" annually, education and other functions occasionally may experience disproportionate cuts in their appropriations.

STATE TAX COMMENTS

By William M. Lester
Director Tax Revision Committee
311 State Capitol, Atlanta, Ga.

NEW TAX LEGISLATION

State Legislatures in more than half of the forty-five states which met this year have adjourned or are nearing adjournment. There are always a number of changes made in the tax laws in every year in which there are regular Legislative Sessions. Many of these changes are made to conform to interpretation of similar laws by the courts. New exemptions are frequently created and exemptions formerly allowed are often withdrawn. Occasionally an unconstitutional and unworkable tax is repealed, and new laws imposed. The Tax Revision Committee, in its study of State Taxes, has endeavored to follow these various changes so that our General Assembly and others interested in tax revision would have information as to tax legislation passed in other states.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE

A number of new taxes have been imposed, aside from license taxes in specific businesses, while more than a hundred bills imposing new taxes of importance have been introduced in the various Legislatures. An attempt has been made in most of these new taxes to tap new fields, so as to meet constantly increasing state budgets. The Legislatures in a number of these states this year have assured their states millions of dollars in additional revenue with practically no additional cost of collection by the simple device of amending the rate section of existing tax laws. In Texas, a bill has been introduced which would, at one swoop, increase by 10% the rates of twelve major taxes in the state.

SEVENTY MILLION DOLLAR QUESTION

In one state a "Seventy Million Dollar Question" has been given to the Legislature. Governor Warren of Florida posed this question to the Legislature of that state in an address to it. He suggested eight types of new taxes which would supply the additional funds needed in such state for the forthcoming biennium. He also suggested doubling the present rate of five other taxes. Since the Legislature has been in session less than a month, none of the suggested tax legislation has been enacted. The "Seventy Million Dollar Question" is, also, unanswered.

TAX BATTLE IN NORTH CAROLINA

In North Carolina the General Assembly which adjourned on April 23 refused to impose any new taxes as requested by Governor Scott. A bitter battle was waged over the Governor's request for a one-cent-a-gallon increase in the gasoline tax and for an election on the issuance of $200 million in bonds to build rural roads. An increase of one cent in the gas tax was finally imposed, but such increase is contingent upon approval of the bond issue by the people at an election, the date of which is to be set by the Governor.

The General Assembly of North Carolina also failed to do as much for the school teachers as Governor Scott wanted done. Although the school forces met with a major set back in the defeat of proposals to adopt a "minimum foundation" plan, calling for joint state and county support of the public schools, the General Assembly did give a 28% pay increase to school teachers, and a 20% boost to other state workers.

GEORGIA TAX CHANGES

The new tax measures passed by our General Assembly at the recent session have met with wide approval throughout the State. The Act classifying Accounts, however, will have to be amended at the 1950 session, as an error was made at the beginning of the second sentence of Section 2. The word "tangible" in this sentence should be "intangible." The General Assembly will no doubt correct this typographical error made in the bill as introduced, enrolled and engrossed. If the members of the General Assembly will submit their tax bills to the Tax Revision Committee, as some did, we will be glad to check them before they are introduced or to prepare such measures upon request.

CHANGES IN TAX RATES

There has been a reduction of rates in a few of the states. In Arkansas the cigarette tax was reduced $1.00 per 1,000 cigarettes. Now, investment income of individuals under Maryland's income tax has been reduced by 1/2 of 1%. On the other side of the record, the gross income tax rate in Indiana has been increased by 1/4 or 1/8 of 1%, depending on the classification of the taxpayer. South Dakota has also increased the gross income tax on car lines by 3 3/4% and also added 1% to the rates of its sales and use, severance and motor excise taxes. Car line companies property tax rate was increased in Wyoming by 1/2 of 1% of assessed value. The severance tax rates have been increased in New Mexico by varying fractional percentages. This state also raised the rates on gasoline, use, fuel and petroleum products other than motor fuels two cents per gallon. The cigarette tax in this state was also increased 1/2 cent per 10 cigarettes. The corporate franchise tax on net incomes of business corporations in New York were increased one per cent.

Other excise tax increases include Montana and North Dakota. In Montana 6% was added to its alcoholic beverage tax rate, and one cent per gallon to its gasoline tax rate. The gasoline tax rate was increased two cents per gallon in North Dakota and its cigarette tax rate was increased one mill per cigarette. Kansas also increased its gasoline tax rate to 5 cents a gallon, and Washington's tax rate per gallon was increased from 5 to 6.5 cents.

Taxpayers in Nevada and New Mexico who smoke will have their cigarette tax increased to four cents per package, while North Dakota taxpayers will have their tax increased from 3 to 5 cents. Washington has increased its cigarette tax rate to 4 cents per pack, but their is some doubt as to its legality.

INCOME TAX CHANGES

New York is the only state which has increased its income tax rate. New Yorkers will pay their personal income taxes for the calendar year 1948 on the basis of 90% of the normal tax instead of 60% as for 1947. Corporations will also pay 5.5% instead of 4.5% as for the preceding year.

In addition to the changes already noted for Maryland and Rhode Island, Arkansas has disallowed the deduction of Federal income taxes. Colorado has granted additional personal exemptions for persons who are over 65 or blind. Kansas and North Carolina have increased the amount of credit allowed for dependents. Kansas, however, has decreased the personal exemption allowance, while Montana has limited personal exemption allowances for certain taxpayers. Both of these states have also joined Georgia in providing as exemptions certain income of veterans. Montana has also amended its law so as to disallow deductions for death, succession, inheritance, estate, legacy, and gift taxes. The net income of production credit agencies will be taxes in New Mexico in the future. The net income of cooperatives and mutual associations will also be taxed by North Carolina.

Some advantages have been given the taxpayer by a few of the states. Idaho has provided for crediting refunds of income tax erroneously paid, whether paid under protest or not. North Dakota will not recognize gain in cases of involuntary conversions. An amendment has been adopted in Montana following the Federal rule for deduction of bad debts. The taxpayers of Colorado may find it an advantage under an amendment in such state which includes building, draft and dairy equipments in the definition of capital assets. This amendment, however, may have the opposite effect for some taxpayers.

SALES AND USE TAXES

The sales and use tax bases have been broadened in several states. In Arkansas an act has been passed requiring all sales of beer, wine, liquor and other intoxicating beverages to be included as taxable retail sales. An act has been passed in Iowa specifically providing that sales of building materials, supplies and equipment to owners, contractors, and builders, are to be construed as retail sales upon which the tax is imposed. In Utah the states sales tax is made to apply to every sale of motor vehicle, thus eliminating sales formerly untaxed because they were considered casual or were made by persons, not dealers. Other measures producing sales tax bases are pending in several Legislatures still in session. Attention will be called to such measures if passed, as well as to any other tax laws enacted.

TEMPORARY INCREASE MADE PERMANENT

Temporary increases of previous years were continued in several states. The Pennsylvania Legislature has made its one cent per gallon increase in the gasoline tax to expire May 31, 1951. It also extended its temporary increased rates on alcoholic beverages, cigarettes, soft drinks and corporate income. Three other states have likewise found it expedient to continue increased temporary rates. In Rhode Island the business corporate franchise tax increased rate was made permanent, while Colorado's income tax and Idaho's gasoline tax were continued. West Virginia has made permanent an increase in its gasoline tax from 4 to 5 cents a gallon which was scheduled to expire this year.

IMPROVEMENT IN PROPERTY ASSESSMENT

A special session of the Kentucky Legislature has adopted most of the program recommended by Governor Clements and Commissioner H. Clyde Reeves for improvement in the administration of property assessment in such state. Provision has been made for better compensation of tax assessors under the legislation passed. A staff has been set up in Commissioner Reeves' office to assist local assessing officials in maintaining sound and equitable property assessment. The services of this staff are optional, but several counties are understood to have already requested assistance along this line.

EVERY MAN'S TAX BURDEN

ALL THE LIVELONG DAY . .

HENRY SUBURBAN reaches out at 7 a.m. of a bright May morning to turn off the alarm clock (price: $5; tax, $1). Accompanied by the trebling of birds, he climbs wearily out of bed (price: $195; annual personal property tax, 75¢), walks across the floor of his $8,000 house (annual general property tax, $240), and switches on the electricity (33¢ tax on his $10 monthly bill) which lights the bulb (price: 20¢; tax, 1¢)

To music from a bedroom radio (price: $30; tax, $3), Henry shaves with his electric (see above) razor. As a radio newscaster reports that Henry's state is preparing to increase income taxes and impose a general sales tax on everything anyone buys, Henry slaps across his jowls a handful of bay rum (price: $1.30; tax, 21¢).

He dresses quickly, hurriedly fastening cuff links (price: $3.50; tax, 70¢), and tie clasp (price: $1.50; tax, 30¢), puts on his Swiss wrist watch (*price. $60; tax, $12), and rushes downstairs. Tucked under one arm is a leather briefcase (price: $18; tax, $3.60) which carries papers from his real estate office, including one deed (property valued at $3,000; stamp tax, $3.30)

In the kitchen, he's just in time to snatch two slices of bread from the electric toaster (price: $16, tax, $3.20), lift his coffee from the gas stove (price: $190; tax, $19), and grab a glass of fruit juice from the refrigerator (price: $300; tax, $30).

A glance out of the window shows it's raining, so he calls to his wife (marriage license, $2) to telephone (monthly bill: $12, tax, $2.05) for a taxi. Too many other people want taxis on a wet morning so Henry gets out his own car (*price: $1,800; tax, $105) and drives (operator's license; $1) to the railroad station.

Henry relaxes at the station with a cigarette (price per pack: 8¢; Federal tax, 7¢), lit by a match (tax: 5½¢ per 1,000). Aboard the train, Henry gives the conductor his ticket (price: 85¢; tax, 13¢) and settles down to a hand of bridge with three cronies, using of course, a deck of cards (price: 40¢; tax, 13¢).

In the city on his way to the office, Henry stops to buy a roll of camera film (price: 20¢; tax, 5¢) that he promised his son (birth registration: $1), and the lipstick (price: $1; tax, 20¢) he promised his wife. Because there are friends coming to his house in the evening, he buys a bottle of whiskey (price: $2.30; tax, $2.60).

Arriving eventually at the office, Henry sighs (no tax!) and settles to a day's work (annual income. $5,000; Federal and state income tax, $510). If he works hard for the rest of his life, he will be able to provide the government with a handsome slice of inheritance tax. And if he dies in a state that is fiscally tolerant, he can take comfort in the thought that his casket provided it costs less than $100—will be exempt from any sales tax.

* Not counting customs duty.
 Plus annual registration of $8; tax of 5¢ on each pound of a new tire; tax of 5 per cent on each new part or accessory; state and Federal gasoline tax average: 5½¢ per gallon

Reprinted from TAX OUTLOOK

Under a burden of this kind, the taxpayers of the State, feeling that the financing of the additional services provided by the Supplemental Appropriation Bill meant additional taxes to be added to our present hodge-podge, voted against the same in the recent referendum. People throughout the State, though, have stated that if our antiquated tax system is revised so as to give us a simplified, equitable, and integrated system, they will be willing to pay whatever taxes are required to provide the services set out in the Bill. In the meantime, Commissioner Redwine reports a net increase of $2,885,976.63 in our collections for the first ten months of this fiscal year over the same period the past year. A net increase of $457,508.51 is shown by the Revenue Department for April, 1949, over the same month in 1948.

SUMMARY OF STATE GOVERNMENT FINANCES IN 1950

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

BUREAU OF THE CENSUS
ROY V. PEEL, Director

GOVERNMENTS DIVISION
Allen D. Manvel, Chief

G-SF50-No.1 Washington 25, D. C. April 1951

State governments spent $13,183 million in the fiscal year 1950, or 11.9 percent more than in fiscal 1949.[1] This is more than double the amount of State expenditure in 1946. The record 1950 total was equal to $89 per capita, which compares with $81 in 1949 and $49 in 1946.

State revenue was also at a new high of $11,863 million in 1950, as against $10,986 million in 1949 and $7,198 million in 1946.

General borrowings of the 48 States in 1950 was about five times the amount provided for debt retirement and was more than double borrowings of the previous year. Gross debt outstanding rose 28.8 percent to a record high of $5,268 million at the end of fiscal 1950, as compared with the postwar low of $2,367 million at the end of 1946.

[1] Data contained in the Census Bureau's annual series on "State Finances" are for State fiscal years that end on June 30, except for 6 States with earlier closing dates (3 in the spring and 3 between the preceding August and December), as shown in table 11.

Trends since 1940 in State general revenue, general expenditure, and total debt are summarized in figure 1 below, which is supported by table 1.

NATURE OF THIS REPORT

The present publication is the first to provide information covering all 1950 revenue and expenditure of the 48 States. A Census Bureau report issued in February 1951, Revenue and Expenditure of Selected States in 1950, provided such information regarding the 30 States for which figures were first compiled. Preliminary 1950 data on taxes were initially released in the August 1950 publication, State Tax Collections in 1950, and additional tax detail on a preliminary basis was supplied by the report Sources of State Tax Revenue in 1950.

Information on State debt outstanding, issued, and retired is also shown in the present report. Summary preliminary data on outstanding

FIG. 1-STATE GENERAL REVENUE, GENERAL EXPENDITURE, AND TOTAL DEBT, 1940-1950

State debt appeared in the December 1950 report, Governmental Debt in 1950.

Financial statistics for the alcoholic-beverage stores operated by 16 States are also first supplied in the present publication.

Some of the 1950 figures shown in this report are subject to possible limited revision. Final and more detailed absolute amounts, as well as additional derived statistics, will appear in a subsequent report, Compendium of State Government Finances in 1950.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE COMPARED

A comparison of 1950 totals of income and utgo for the 48 States together shows that:

General expenditure exceeded general revenue by $1,320 million or 11.1 percent;

General expenditure less provision for debt retirement exceeded general revenue by $1,044 million or 8.8 percent;

General revenue and borrowings exceeded general expenditure by about $8 million.

Comparative totals for the fiscal years 1950 and 1949 were as follows (amounts in millions):

Classification	1950	1949
Total general revenue and borrowings	$13,191	$11,574
General borrowings	1,328	588
Total general revenue	11,863	10,986
Total general expenditure	13,183	11,782
Provision for debt retirement	275	226
General expenditure less provision for debt retirement	12,907	11,557

The foregoing figures indicate a continuance of trends noted in the three preceding years, involving a tendency for expenditure to increase at a greater rate than revenue, after several years of revenue surpluses. In 1948, nevertheless, a majority of States still had more revenue than expenditure.

In 1949 and 1950, however, 33 States and 40 States, respectively, had larger total expenditure than total revenue.

GENERAL REVENUE AND BORROWING

State government revenue was $876 million greater in 1950 than in 1949. More than two-thirds of this increase was accounted for by taxes, up $591 million or 7.1 percent from the previous year's level.

A faster rate of increase applied to State revenue from Federal aid, which rose 15.0 percent. Revenue from charges and miscellaneous sources increased only 1.7 percent.

State taxes produced $8,940 million in fiscal 1950, as compared with $8,349 million in the previous year. These amounts include payroll taxes held in trust for payment of unemployment compensation benefits and hence not available for general State purposes. Excluding these pay-roll levies (which rose 5.7 percent in 1950), tax collections amounted to $7,912 million in 1950, or 7.3 percent more than in the preceding year.

Federal aid received by States in fiscal 1950 totaled $1,960 million, as compared with $1,705 million in 1949 and only $743 million in 1946. Aid from local governments amounted to $70 million.

Income from charges and miscellaneous general revenue reached $893 million in 1950, as compared with $878 million the year before.

State borrowing for general-government purposes in fiscal 1950 amounted to $1,328 million as against $588 million in fiscal 1949.

A summary of general revenue and borrowings for each State is presented in table 2. Additional detail on tax revenue appears in table 3.

GENERAL EXPENDITURE

For all but 6 States, total general expenditure in 1950 exceeded that of the previous fiscal year.

Operation spending, the largest major component, rose from $4,972 million in fiscal 1949 to $5,457 million in fiscal 1950, or 9.7 percent. These sums include bonus payments to veterans of World War II by several States--$457 million in 1950 and $505 million in 1949.

All other functions contributed to the marked expansion in operation expenditure. By far the largest increase in both absolute and relative terms was for public welfare operation (primarily public assistance payments under State-administered programs), which cost $1,578 million in 1950 as compared with $1,306 million the preceding year. Other large increases in operation expenditure were for school purposes, up $75 million, and hospitals and institutions for the handicapped, up $59 million.

Aid to local governments--comprising both grants and shares allocated to local governments of taxes imposed and collected by the States--amounted to $4,011 million, or 30.4 percent of all State general expenditure in fiscal 1950. This is 13.2 percent higher than the 1949 aid amount. Nearly half of the 1950 sum, $1,982 million, was for school purposes; $773 million was for public welfare; and $576 million was for local streets and highways.

Capital outlay of State governments amounted to $2,112 million in 1950, up 15.6 percent from the year before and more than the total for the 5 fiscal years 1942 to 1946, when such spending was limited by wartime restrictions and shortages.

Statistics on general expenditure for each State are shown in table 4, classified by character; table 5 shows operation expenditure by function; and table 6 presents selected data on capital outlay and aid paid to local governments.

ALCOHOLIC-BEVERAGE SYSTEMS

The alcoholic beverage stores operated by 16 States had a net income of $157 million in fiscal 1950, slightly less than in the preceding year. These systems made net contributions of $171 million to the general-government funds of their respective States during the year.

Monopoly-system data are in tables 7 and 8.

GENERAL AND ENTERPRISE DEBT

Long-term debt issued by States during fiscal 1950 amounted to $1,343 million. The comparable total for the preceding fiscal year was $727 million. The bulk of the issuance of long-term debt in 1950 involved relatively few States--mainly Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Minnesota, California, Washington, and Oklahoma, in that order--but numerous other States issued sizable amounts. Retirement of long-term debt by the States totaled $271 million during the fiscal year 1950.

State gross debt outstanding (including a small proportion for enterprise purposes) rose to a new high of $5,268 million at the end of fiscal 1950, as against $4,090 million a year earlier. The 1950 total is equal to $35.66 per capita.

Statistics on debt outstanding and on long-term debt issued and retired appear in table 9 of this report. It should be noted that these data relate to both general and enterprise debt, whereas statistics of "general borrowings," "provision for debt retirement," and "interest," shown in tables 1, 2, and 4, relate to general debt only.

INTERSTATE COMPARISONS

Caution must be exercised in attempting to draw conclusions from direct comparison of financial amounts for individual State governments. The States differ widely in the scope and intensity of their responsibilities. There is a lack of uniformity, as among various parts of the country, in traditions concerning the extent and quality of public services and in economic ability to support such services. Perhaps even more important, differences exist in the allocation of responsibility, as between State and local government units, for particular public functions. Some State governments directly administer certain activities which elsewhere are locally handled, either with or without extensive financial assistance from the State.

The fraction which State government amounts make up of total State and local finances therefore differs materially from one State area to another. Percentage figures illustrating this variation, in terms of 1942 tax revenue data, are presented in table 11. No more recent figures of this nature are available.

Table 10 deals with one factor of difference among States--their range in population size--by presenting per capita amounts of selected financial items. The considerable range which exists in the total scale of State government finances is indicated by the following distributions of the 48 States:

FIG. 2-PERCENT CHANGE, 1949-1950, IN STATE GENERAL REVENUE AND GENERAL EXPENDITURE

SOURCES AND TERMINOLOGY

Data for this report were compiled by trained representatives of the Census Bureau from official State records and reports, primarily in the State fiscal offices. The figures were classified according to standard Census categories for reporting of State finances, and subjected to careful review as so classified. The cooperation of State officials in providing information for this report is gratefully acknowledged.

Census provision of comparative and aggregate financial statistics calls for presentation of data in terms of uniform categories whereby, for example, expenditure amounts for similar purposes are combined regardless of the number of funds involved. Figures in this report are, therefore, unlikely to agree directly with specific amounts in official State records and reports, except where particular segments of such sources conform explicitly with standard Census categories. A leaflet discussing the "Relation of Census Statistics on Governmental Finances to Original Sources" is available from the Bureau of the Census upon request.

Definitions of some of the terms used in this and other Census Bureau reports on "State Finances" are presented on pages 16-17 of the present report. A more detailed glossary of principal concepts and categories applied in Census reporting on finances of State governments appears in the Compendium report of this annual series.

DEFINITIONS OF SELECTED TERMS

AID PAID TO LOCAL GOVERNMENTS--Payments, other than loans, by a State to local governments for the support of specified functions or for general financial support. Included are grants from unspecified sources and from Federal aid and other earmarked State revenues and local shares of State imposed taxes, except any amounts locally collected and retained. Does not include the value of aid in kind rather than cash. Excluded here, and treated as "operation" expenditure, are payments to reimburse local governments for contractual services rendered at the instance of the State government. Also excluded are Federal grants or shared revenues merely channeled through the State to particular local governments and not involving State discretion as to distribution. See also "AID RECEIVED FROM OTHER GOVERNMENTS."

AID RECEIVED FROM OTHER GOVERNMENTS--Amounts received by a State from the Federal Government for support of specified functions and amounts received in lieu of taxes and as shared Federal revenues, including sums reapportioned by the State to local governments; and any amounts similarly received by a State from local governments. Excluded, however, are Federal grants or shared revenues merely channeled through the State to particular local governments and not involving State discretion as to distribution. Does not include loans or the value of aid in kind rather than cash. Reimbursements received for contractual services rendered to other governments by the State are reported under "charges for current services," rather than as aid received.

CAPITAL OUTLAY--Expenditure--including that financed from borrowing--for purchase or construction of assets in the form of land, permanent improvements, and durable equipment, including additions, replacements, and major alterations.

CHARGES AND MISCELLANEOUS GENERAL REVENUE--All nontax general revenue other than aid received from other governments. Charges comprise fees and other amounts received in payment for services performed for individuals and for other governments. Revenue derived from auxiliary activities incident to particular functions (e.g., university dormitories) comprises only the excess of receipts over expenditures. Miscellaneous nontax revenue includes revenue from fines, forfeits, and unclaimed monies; interest, rent of miscellaneous property, and royalties; contributions from enterprises (largely from alcoholic-beverage monopoly systems in the States operating such systems); and unclassified nontax revenue.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO ENTERPRISES--The sum of the net contributions made by a State to its enterprises. Such a net contribution, for each enterprise, consists of the excess of taxes and other general revenue paid to or on behalf of the enterprise (e.g., for operating deficit, capital improvements, or debt service) over payments by the enterprise to or on behalf of the State general government.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO TRUST FUNDS--Taxes or other general revenue credited or amounts transferred from general-government funds to trust funds. Consists largely of pay roll tax collections deposited in the unemployment compensation trust fund of the U. S. Treasury to the credit of the individual State. See also "TRUST FUNDS."

DEBT --All long-term credit obligations incurred and outstanding in the name of the State or its agencies whether backed by the State's full faith and credit or nonguaranteed, and all interest-bearing short-term credit obligations.

ENTERPRISES --Undertakings of the State--other than those incident to performance of general governmental functions--which involve selling, or producing for sale, to the general public goods or services which are usually or commonly sold or produced for profit under private auspices. Comprises alcoholic-beverage monopoly systems, water and power projects, and other undertakings involving significant amounts and for which separate and relatively complete accounts are maintained.

ENTERPRISE DEBT --Debt incurred to finance enterprise activities. Includes any amounts payable from tax revenue or other general-government resources, as well as amounts payable from enterprise earnings. See "ENTERPRISES."

EXPENDITURE--See "GENERAL EXPENDITURE."

GENERAL BORROWINGS--Long-term general debt incurred other than for funding or refunding of existing debt, plus any excess of issuance over redemption (i.e., retirement other than by funding) of short-term general debt.

GENERAL DEBT --Debt incurred to finance general government (q.v.) activities as distinguished from enterprises.

GENERAL EXPENDITURE--All charges arising in a particular fiscal period from the conduct of general government (q.v.) including provision for retirement of general debt. Expenditures are reported on the basis most readily available from official sources (i.e., accrued charges, audited claims, or disbursements).

GENERAL GOVERNMENT--All activities of a State including its dependent agencies, boards, and commissions, except the conduct of enterprises and transactions of sinking and trust funds. Includes general-government activities financed through "the general fund", special revenue funds, bond funds, and all other funds, however named.

GENERAL REVENUE--All revenue from general-government sources. Revenue comprises all cash receipts other than from borrowing, disposal of assets, recovery of amounts previously expended, or agency transactions, but net of refunds of amounts previously received. General government sources consist of all taxes, all aid received from other governments (except amounts directly for enterprises) and charges and miscellaneous revenue arising from general government activities. General revenue includes net contributions from enterprises. Any amounts of taxes or other revenue from general government sources credited directly to sinking, trust, or enterprise funds are classified as general revenue.

GROSS DEBT --Total of outstanding long- and short-term, general and enterprise debt.

INTEREST-- Charges for the use of borrowed money (without adjustment for premium or discount on debt issued or retired), including all interest paid by any fund on both long- and short-term indebtedness. General expenditure for interest comprises interest on general debt, including direct payments from general funds plus payments into sinking funds up to the amount of any interest on general debt paid during the same period by sinking funds. Total interest payments--not shown in this report--comprise all interest paid on general and enterprise debt, including interest paid from accumulated assets and earnings of sinking and trust funds.

LICENSE AND PRIVILEGE TAXES --Taxes exacted from corporations or individuals as a condition to the exercise of a business or nonbusiness privilege. The tax may be at a flat rate or measured by such bases as capital stock, capital surplus, number of units, or capacity, but not directly by transactions, gross or net income, or value of property.

LONG-TERM DEBT --Debt payable more than one year after date of issue, including bonds, mortgages, debt to trust funds, judgments and the like. Tax anticipation warrants outstanding more than one year are considered short-term debt if they are payable from a specific tax levy.

NET LONG-TERM DEBT --Long-term debt less sinking-fund offsets to such debt.

OPERATION--Expenditure arising from direct performance of general government functions in the current fiscal period and resulting in no addition to capital assets.

PROVISION FOR DEBT RETIREMENT--Direct debt redemption plus payments into sinking funds of amounts dedicated to debt retirement, including taxes or other general revenue credited directly therefor to sinking funds. Excludes debt retirement by payments from sinking funds and by funding or refunding. General expenditure for provision for debt retirement relates only to general debt (as distinguished from enterprise debt).

REVENUE--See "GENERAL REVENUE."

SALES AND GROSS RECEIPTS TAXES --Taxes including licenses) based upon the volume or value of transfers of goods or services, upon receipts therefrom, or upon gross income; and related taxes based upon use, storage, or consumption of goods. Excluded are distinctively imposed severance taxes.

SINKING-FUND OFFSETS--All assets of reserve funds specifically held for redemption of long-term debt, including deposits in the hands of fiscal agents for redemption of uncanceled debt and balances in refunding bond accounts held pending completion of refunding transactions. Also includes assets of certain credit funds which offset debt incurred to finance loan activities of those funds. Excludes amounts of sinking-fund assets in excess of the specific debt for which they were accumulated and any separately recorded amounts held for future payments.

TAXES--Compulsory contributions exacted for public purposes. Tax figures represent amounts of collections, current and delinquent with penalties and interest, and before deduction of administrative costs but after deduction of refunds. Included are local shares of State-imposed taxes except any amounts locally collected and retained. (For detailed preliminary data by source, see the Census Bureau reports, State Tax Collections in 1950 and Sources of State Tax Revenue in 1950.)

TRUST FUNDS --Funds that accumulate and administer assets over a period of years to finance contingent needs (e.g., employee retirement, unemployment compensation) and funds that receive grants and donations or bequests the principal of which must be held intact by the State as trustee with the income to be administered for specifically designated public purposes. Taxes or other general revenue credited to trust funds are shown first as general revenue, and then as general expenditure for contributions to trust funds.

G-SF50-No.3 · Washington 25, D. C. February 1951

Both revenue and expenditure of State governments were substantially higher in fiscal 1950 than in the preceding year.[1] Figures now at hand indicate that the rise in expenditure was somewhat greater than that of revenue.

Spending by the 30 States for which 1950 figures have been first compiled was up 9 percent from the 1949 level. This would suggest that total expenditure of the 48 States in 1950 was about $12.8 billion, as compared with $11.8 billion in 1949 and only $6.4 billion in 1946.

NATURE OF THIS REPORT

The continuing upward trend in State expenditure has been anticipated generally in Census Bureau reports on governmental employment. Preliminary 1950 statistics on tax revenue and debt of all 48 State governments have been issued in other Census publications.[2] The present publication, however, is the first to provide uniformly classified statistics on State expenditure as such in fiscal 1950, as well as on State nontax revenue and general borrowing.

The Census Bureau report, Summary of State Government Finances in 1950, will provide statistics for all 48 States. Pending the availability of such over-all information, about 3 months hence, the 30-State figures in the present report must be used cautiously in attempting to ascertain Nation-wide trends.

The States covered by this advance report were not selected as a representative group; rather, they are the States for which 1950 information could be most promptly compiled. As indicated by table 1, these States accounted for about 54 percent of all State government revenue and expenditure in fiscal 1949.

[1] Data contained in the Census Bureau's annual series on "State Finances" are for State fiscal years that end on June 30, except for 6 States with earlier closing dates (3 in the spring and 3 between the preceding August and December), as shown in table 7.

[2] Bureau of the Census, State Employment in 1950 (August 1950), State Tax Collections in 1950 (August 1950), and Governmental Debt in 1950 (December 1950).

GENERAL REVENUE AND BORROWING

Total general revenue of the 30 States here reported was 5.4 percent greater in 1950 than in 1949. Although a major part of this increase came from taxes (up 3.9 percent), Federal aid rose much more sharply (14.1 percent).

One State--West Virginia--experienced a decrease in total general revenue. In 10 other States, there was a revenue increase of less than 5 percent from the 1949 level. An increase of from 5 percent up to 17.4 percent (South Dakota) appears for the other States.

Total borrowing by these States for general government purposes amounted to $771 million in 1950 as compared with $388 million in 1949.

GENERAL EXPENDITURE

Total general expenditure of the 30 States together rose 9.0 percent from 1949 to 1950. In per capita terms, the change was from $82.27 to $88.10.

These States differed widely in rate of change in expenditure between 1949 and 1950, as indicated by the following distribution of the 30 States:

Percent change, 1949 to 1950	Total general expenditure	Operation	Capital outlay	Aid paid to local governments
Decrease.....	5	5	10	3
Increase of:
Less than 10.....	10	8	6	12
10-20.....	9	7	5	10
20-30.....	2	4	5	2
30-40.....	1	2	1	1
40 or over.....	3	4	3	2

Capital outlay continued at relatively high levels in most of the States here reported, with an over-all 1949-50 increase of 7.7 percent. About two-thirds of all capital outlay by these 30 States was for highways.

Aid paid to local governments also rose materially between 1949 and 1950 in most of these States. The over-all rate of increase was 8.7 percent. A major portion of the additional aid provided was for school purposes.

Operation spending (including direct public assistance and veterans' bonus payments) remained the largest major category of general expenditure of these 30 States in 1950, and was up by 10.5 percent from the previous year. As indicated by table 1, operation spending rose for every major function.

SOURCES AND TERMINOLOGY, AND LIMITATIONS

Data for this report were compiled by trained representatives of the Census Bureau from official records and reports of the 30 States covered. The figures were classified according to standard Census categories for reporting of State finances, and subjected to careful review as so classified. The kindness of State officials in providing information for this report is gratefully acknowledged.

Census provision of comparative and aggregate financial statistics calls for presentation of data in terms of uniform categories whereby, for example, expenditure amounts for similar purposes are combined regardless of the number of funds involved. Figures in this report are, therefore, unlikely to agree directly with specific amounts in official State records and reports, except where particular segments of such sources conform explicitly with standard Census categories. A leaflet discussing the "Relation of Census Statistics on Governmental Finances to Original Sources" is available from the Bureau of the Census upon request.

Caution must be used in attempting to draw conclusions from direct comparison of financial amounts for individual State governments. The States vary widely in the scope and intensity of their responsibilities. Such variations reflect differences in State and local traditions as to the extent and quality of public services; in economic ability to support such services; and in the pattern for distribution of responsibility, as between the State and local levels, for performing and financing particular governmental functions. Some State governments directly administer certain activities which elsewhere are undertaken by local governments, with or without State fiscal aid.

The fraction which State government amounts make up of total State and local finances therefore differs materially from one State area to another. Percentage figures illustrating this variation, in terms of 1942 tax revenue data, are presented in table 7. No more recent figures of this nature are available.

Definitions of some of the terms used in this and other Census Bureau reports on "State Finances" are presented on pages 10-11. A comprehensive glossary appears in the "Compendium" report of this annual series.

DEFINITIONS OF SELECTED TERMS

AID PAID TO LOCAL GOVERNMENTS--Payments, other than loans, by a State to local governments for the support of specified functions or for general financial support. Included are grants from unspecified sources and from Federal aid and other earmarked State revenues and local shares of State imposed taxes, except any amounts locally collected and retained. Does not include the value of aid in kind rather than cash. Excluded here, and treated as "operation" expenditure, are payments to reimburse local governments for contractual services rendered at the instance of the State government. Also excluded are Federal grants or shared revenues merely channeled through the State to particular local governments and not involving State discretion as to distribution. See also "AID RECEIVED FROM OTHER GOVERNMENTS."

AID RECEIVED FROM OTHER GOVERNMENTS--Amounts received by a State from the Federal Government for support of specified functions and amounts received in lieu of taxes and as shared Federal revenues, including sums reapportioned by the State to local governments; and any amounts similarly received by a State from local governments. Excluded, however, are Federal grants or shared revenues merely channeled through the State to particular local governments and not involving State discretion as to distribution. Does not include loans or the value of aid in kind rather than cash. Reimbursements received for contractual services rendered to other governments by the State are reported under "charges for current services," rather than as aid received.

CAPITAL OUTLAY--Expenditure--including that financed from borrowing--for purchase or construction of assets in the form of land, permanent improvements, and durable equipment, including additions, replacements, and major alterations.

CHARGES AND MISCELLANEOUS GENERAL REVENUE--All nontax general revenue other than aid received from other governments. Charges comprise fees and other amounts received in payment for services performed for individuals and for other governments. Revenue derived from auxiliary activities incident to particular functions (e.g., university dormitories) comprises only the excess of receipts over expenditures. Miscellaneous nontax revenue includes revenue from fines, forfeits, and unclaimed monies; interest, rent of miscellaneous property, and royalties; contributions from enterprises (largely from alcoholic-beverage monopoly systems in the States operating such systems); and unclassified nontax revenue.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO ENTERPRISES--The sum of the net contributions made by a State to its enterprises. Such a net contribution, for each enterprise, consists of the excess of taxes and other general revenue paid to or on behalf of the enterprise (e.g., for operating deficit, capital improvements, or debt service) over payments by the enterprise to or on behalf of the State general government.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO TRUST FUNDS--Taxes or other general revenue credited or amounts transferred from general-government funds to trust funds. Consists largely of pay roll tax collections deposited in the unemployment compensation trust fund of the U. S. Treasury to the credit of the individual State. See also "TRUST FUNDS."

DEBT[1]--All long-term credit obligations incurred and outstanding in the name of the State or its agencies whether backed by the State's full faith and credit or nonguaranteed, and all interest-bearing short-term credit obligations.

ENTERPRISES[1]--Undertakings of the State--other than those incident to performance of general governmental functions--which involve selling, or producing for sale, to the general public goods or services which are usually or commonly sold or produced for profit under private auspices. Comprises alcoholic-beverage monopoly systems, water and power projects, and other undertakings involving significant amounts and for which separate and relatively complete accounts are maintained.

ENTERPRISE DEBT[1]--Debt incurred to finance enterprise activities. Includes any amounts payable from tax revenue or other general-government resources, as well as amounts payable from enterprise earnings. See "ENTERPRISES."

EXPENDITURE--See "GENERAL EXPENDITURE."

GENERAL BORROWINGS--Long-term general debt incurred other than for funding or refunding of existing debt, plus any excess of issuance over redemption (i.e., retirement other than by funding) of short-term general debt.

GENERAL DEBT[1] --Debt incurred to finance general government (q.v.) activities as distinguished from enterprises.

GENERAL EXPENDITURE--All charges arising in a particular fiscal period from the conduct of general government (q.v.) including provision for retirement of general debt. Expenditures are reported on the basis most readily available from official sources (i.e., accrued charges, audited claims, or disbursements).

GENERAL GOVERNMENT--All activities of a State including its dependent agencies, boards, and commissions, except the conduct of enterprises and transactions of sinking and trust funds. Includes general-government activities financed through "the general fund", special revenue funds, bond funds, and all other funds, however named.

GENERAL REVENUE--All revenue from general-government sources. Revenue comprises all cash receipts other than from borrowing, disposal of assets, recovery of amounts previously expended, or agency transactions, but net of refunds of amounts previously received. General government sources consist of all taxes, all aid received from other governments (except amounts directly for enterprises) and charges and miscellaneous revenue arising from general government activities. General revenue includes net contributions from enterprises. Any amounts of taxes or other revenue from general government sources credited directly to sinking, trust, or enterprise funds are classified as general revenue.

GROSS DEBT[1]--Total of outstanding long- and short-term, general and enterprise debt.

INTEREST-- Charges for the use of borrowed money (without adjustment for premium or discount on debt issued or retired), including all interest paid by any fund on both long- and short-term indebtedness. General expenditure for interest comprises interest on general debt, including direct payments from general funds plus payments into sinking funds up to the amount of any interest on general debt paid during the same period by sinking funds. Total interest payments--not shown in this report--comprise all interest paid on general and enterprise debt, including interest paid from accumulated assets and earnings of sinking and trust funds.

LICENSE AND PRIVILEGE TAXES[1]--Taxes exacted from corporations or individuals as a condition to the exercise of a business or nonbusiness privilege. The tax may be at a flat rate or measured by such bases as capital stock, capital surplus, number of units, or capacity, but not directly by transactions, gross or net income, or value of property.

LONG-TERM DEBT[1]--Debt payable more than one year after date of issue, including bonds, mortgages, debt to trust funds, judgments and the like. Tax anticipation warrants outstanding more than one year are considered short-term debt if they are payable from a specific tax levy.

NET LONG-TERM DEBT[1]--Long-term debt less sinking-fund offsets to such debt.

OPERATION--Expenditure arising from direct performance of general government functions in the current fiscal period and resulting in no addition to capital assets.

PROVISION FOR DEBT RETIREMENT--Direct debt redemption plus payments into sinking funds of amounts dedicated to debt retirement, including taxes or other general revenue credited directly therefor to sinking funds. Excludes debt retirement by payments from sinking funds and by funding or refunding. General expenditure for provision for debt retirement relates only to general debt (as distinguished from enterprise debt).

REVENUE--See "GENERAL REVENUE."

SALES AND GROSS RECEIPTS TAXES[1]--Taxes including licenses) based upon the volume or value of transfers of goods or services, upon receipts therefrom, or upon gross income; and related taxes based upon use, storage, or consumption of goods. Excluded are distinctively imposed severance taxes.

SINKING FUNDS[1]--All reserve funds specifically held for redemption of long-term debt. Includes funds which accumulate assets over a period of years and funds having no assets except cash balances (e.g., deposits in the hands of fiscal agents, and balances in refunding bond accounts). Amounts for payment of interest, where segregable, are not included. All assets of sinking funds are treated as offsets to long-term debt except any excess of assets over the outstanding amount of the specific debt for the retirement of which they were accumulated.

TAXES--Compulsory contributions exacted for public purposes. Tax figures represent amounts of collections, current and delinquent with penalties and interest, and before deduction of administrative costs but after deduction of refunds. Included are local shares of State-imposed taxes except any amounts locally collected and retained. (For detailed preliminary data by source, see the Census Bureau reports, State Tax Collections in 1950 and Sources of State Tax Revenue in 1950.)

TRUST FUNDS[1]--Funds that accumulate and administer assets over a period of years to finance contingent needs (e.g., employee retirement, unemployment compensation) and funds that receive grants and donations or bequests the principal of which must be held intact by the State as trustee with the income to be administered for specifically designated public purposes. Taxes or other general revenue credited to trust funds are shown first as general revenue, and then as general expenditure for contributions to trust funds.

G-SF52-No.4 Washington 25, D. C. August 1952

State tax yields in the 1952 fiscal year[1] totaled $9.8 billion. This amount was up 10.1 percent from the $8.9 billion collected in 1951 and was 152.1 percent higher than the 1942 amount of $3.9 billion.

The 1951-1952 increase of $0.9 billion was somewhat less than the 1950-1951 rise of $1.0 billion, but it was substantially greater than the annual increases reported in the two previous years. The chart below depicts trends in State tax revenue since 1942.

NATURE OF THIS REPORT

Tax figures herein are net of refunds paid, but include amounts of State-imposed taxes collected or received by the State and subsequently distributed to local governments. Locally collected and retained tax amounts are not included. The 1952 figures are preliminary. Final State tax figures will appear in subsequent Census reports.

This publication relates to revenue from State taxes only. In 1951, tax revenue of local governments amounted to $8.6 billion,[2] or slightly less than the $8.9 billion collected by the States.

Statistics on State revenue in 1952 from nontax sources have not yet been compiled. In fiscal 1951 the States received over $6.6 billion from such sources, including $2.2 billion in aid from the Federal Government and $2.3 billion from insurance trust sources. About two-thirds of all State insurance trust revenue in 1951 represented "contributions" collected for unemployment compensation. Such contributions were classified as tax revenue in Census reports for several years prior to 1951. However, in Census reports for 1951 and herein, tax revenue figures (including prior year amounts) are exclusive of such unemployment compensation contributions.

Summary historical and analytical data are presented in tables 1 and 2; statistics on 1952 collections from major types of taxes, by State, in tables 3-5; and data on fiscal years, population, and income payments in table 6.

Definitions of the standard categories for Census reporting of State tax revenue are presented on pages 9-10.

MAJOR TAX SOURCES

All major tax categories, except alcoholic beverages taxes, shared in the 1951-1952 net rise in State tax yields. The largest amount of increase was provided by general sales and gross receipts taxes--up $228 million or 11.4 percent. However, most of this increase was accounted for by newly enacted sales taxes in Maine and South Carolina and the Georgia tax which became effective in late fiscal 1951. Sales taxes on motor fuel were up $161 million, or 9.4 percent. Increases in tax rates in several States contributed to this rise.

General sales and gross receipts taxes continued as the largest single source of State tax revenue, providing $2.2 billion. This category accounted for more than one-fifth of total State tax yields in 1952, even though such taxes were in effect in only 31 States.

The next ranking source was the sales tax on motor fuel, which produced $1,871 million. Tobacco sales taxes provided $449 million, up 4.4 percent from the 1951 amount. Alcoholic beverage sales taxes produced $442 million, or 5.8 percent less than in the previous year. Altogether, general and selective sales and gross receipts taxes yielded $5,730 million, or nearly three-fifths of the total collected from all State tax sources.

Corporation and individual income taxes together rose 16.3 percent from $1,492 million in 1951 to $1,736 million in 1952. Excluding amounts for 5 States which reported combined collections for these taxes in 1952, collections of individual income taxes rose 11.9 percent and of corporation net income taxes 22.0 percent.

Motor vehicle and motor vehicle operators license taxes provided $924 million, up $84 million or 10.0 percent from the 1951 level.

Sharp rates of increase, although involving much smaller amounts, appear for severance taxes (up 22.6 percent to $272 million) and for selective sales taxes on public utilities (up 14.4 percent to $228 million) and on insurance companies (up 11.7 percent to $284 million).

INDIVIDUAL-STATE COMPARISONS

All of the States except two reported higher total tax yields in 1952 than in 1951. Total tax revenue of Delaware was down 15.5 percent and that of South Dakota was down 7.3 percent. Seven States reported a 1951-1952 increase of more than 15 percent. The collections of 7 States were up by 5 percent or less; 22 States reported gains of 5 to 10 percent; and 10 States show increases of 10 to 15 percent. The highest rates of increase appear for Georgia (up 49.5 percent), South Carolina (up 41.7 percent), Maine (up 30.3 percent), Vermont (up 28.6 percent), and Rhode Island (up 25.8 percent). The greatest amounts of increase appear for New York (up $109 million or 11.8 percent) and California (up $106 million or 11.0 percent).

California collected $1,064 million in State taxes and New York $1,024 million in fiscal 1952, far more than the next ranking States of Pennsylvania ($538 million), Michigan ($503 million), Illinois ($455 million) and Ohio ($451 million).

Per capita amounts of State tax revenue in 1952 ranged from $103 in Washington and Louisiana down to $36 in New Jersey. The 48-State average equaled $64. The ratio of State tax yields in fiscal 1952 to income payments in the calendar year 1951 averaged 4.1 percent, and ranged from less than 3.0 percent in 3 States to 7.0 percent or more in 3 States.

Inter-State comparisons of tax data in this report should take account particularly of the fact that the proportion of total State and local tax revenue which is contributed by State-imposed taxes differs materially from one State area to another. Percentage figures illustrating this variation, in terms of 1942 data, are presented in table 6. Nationally, and no doubt in most if not all States, the State tax portion of all State and local tax revenue has risen since that time. However, no more recent comparative data are available as to total State and local taxes in the several States.

NOTES ON PROCEDURE

Most of the amounts shown in this publication were reported by State officials to the Census Bureau in response to a mail canvass. In a few cases data were obtained from State publications.

In reporting tax revenue amounts for this publication--which is released annually within less than 60 days after the June 30 fiscal year closing date of 42 States--officials are urged to supply preliminary figures or estimates as to items for which final figures are not yet available. Moreover, in some States where data are not yet available centrally as to certain taxes, supplementary information is sought wherever possible from minor tax collecting agencies and other sources. For these reasons, final 1952 figures as to some tax items may differ somewhat from the amounts shown herein.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

State officials and their staffs were most cooperative in providing data for this report. Their assistance is gratefully acknowledged.

[2]Computed on the basis of amounts rounded to the nearest thousand. Per capita figures for 1952 are based on 1951 population figures shown in table 6; those for 1942 are based on estimated total population of the 48 States on July 1, 1941 (132,300,000; excludes armed forces overseas).

[3]Revised.

[4]Combined corporation and individual income taxes as reported for from 1 to 5 States in each fiscal period shown are tabulated with individual income taxes. See also footnote 1, table 3. Therefore, derived data are not presented separately as to the two tax categories.

[1]Combined corporation and individual income taxes as reported by 5 States--Alabama, Arizona, Louisiana, Missouri, and New Mexico-- are tabulated with individual income taxes. Amount shown as corporation tax for Alabama represents only taxes on financial institutions.

[2]Back taxes only; not counted with "Number of States using tax."

[3]Amounts for corporation excise taxes and surtaxes, measured in part by net income and in part by corporate excess, are tabulated with license taxes.

[4]Corporate excess tax is included with corporation net income tax.

DEFINITIONS OF STATE TAXES

State tax revenue comprises amounts collected--including interest and penalties but excluding amounts refunded--from all taxes imposed by a State and collected by it or collected and transmitted to it by local governments. State tax revenue includes local shares of State-imposed taxes except any amounts locally collected and retained.

Standard categories for Census reporting of State tax collections are defined below.

PROPERTY TAXES (R11).—Taxes conditioned on ownership of property and measured by its value. Includes general property taxes relating to property as a whole, real and personal, tangible or intangible, whether taxed at a single rate or at classified rates, and taxes on selected types of property, such as motor vehicles or certain or all intangibles.

SALES AND GROSS RECEIPTS TAXES (R12).—Taxes, including "licenses" at more than nominal rates, based upon the volume or value of transfers of goods or services, upon gross receipts therefrom, or upon gross income, and related taxes based upon use, storage, production, importation, or consumption of goods. Dealer discounts or "commissions" allowed to merchants for collection of taxes from consumers are excluded. Distinctively imposed severance taxes are excluded here and reported under that category (see "R18" below).

General sales or gross receipts taxes (R12A).—Sales or gross receipts taxes which are applicable with only specified exceptions to all types of goods, all types of goods and services, or all gross income, whether at a single rate or at classified rates. Taxes imposed distinctively upon sales of or gross receipts from selected commodities, services, or businesses are reported separately under categories listed below.

Selective sales and gross receipts taxes (R12B).—Sales and gross receipts taxes imposed on sales of particular commodities or services or gross receipts of particular businesses separately and apart from the application of general sales and gross receipts taxes (see R12A above).

Motor fuels (R12B1).—Selective sales and gross receipts taxes on gasoline, diesel oil and other fuels used in motor vehicles, including aircraft fuel. Note that any amounts refunded are deducted from gross collections.

Alcoholic beverages (R12 B2).—Selective sales and gross receipts taxes on alcoholic beverages.

Public utilities (R12B3).—Taxes imposed distinctively on public passenger and freight transportation companies, telephone, telegraph, and light and power companies, and other public utility companies and measured by gross receipts, gross earnings, or units of service sold. Taxes levied on such companies on other bases are classified elsewhere in accordance with the nature of the tax.

Insurance (R12B4).—Taxes imposed distinctively on insurance companies and measured by gross premiums or adjusted gross premiums.

Tobacco products (R12B5).—Selective sales and gross receipts taxes on tobacco products, including cigarette tubes and papers.

Pari-mutuels (R12B6).—Taxes measured by amounts wagered at race tracks, including "breakage" collected by the government.

Amusements (R12B7).—Selective sales and gross receipts taxes on admission tickets or admission charges and on gross receipts of all or specified types of amusement businesses.

Other selective sales and gross receipts taxes (R12B9).—Selective sales and gross receipts taxes relating to specific commodities, businesses, or services not separately enumerated above (e.g., lubricating oil, fuel other than motor fuel, meals, margarine, cement, etc.).

LICENSE TAXES (R13).—Taxes exacted (either for revenue raising or for regulation) as a condition to the exercise of a business or nonbusiness privilege, at a flat rate or measured by such bases as capital stock, capital surplus, number of business units, or capacity. Excludes taxes measured directly by transactions, gross or net income, or value of property except those to which only nominal rates apply. "Licenses" based on these latter measures, other than those at nominal rates, are classified according to the measure concerned.

Alcoholic beverages (R13A).—License taxes for manufacturing, importing, wholesaling, and retailing alcoholic beverages other than those based on volume or value of transactions or assessed value of property.

Public utilities (R13B).—License taxes distinctively imposed on public passenger and freight transportation companies, telephone, telegraph, and light and power companies, and other public utility companies.

Motor vehicles (R13E).—License taxes imposed on owners or operators of motor vehicles, commercial and noncommercial, for the right to use public highways, including charges for title registration and inspection of vehicles. Does not include taxes on the business of motor transport nor property taxes or sales and gross receipts taxes relating to motor vehicles.

Motor vehicle operators (R13F).—Licenses for privilege of driving motor vehicles, including both private and commercial licenses.

Corporations in general (R13H).—Franchise license taxes, organization, filing, and entrance fees, and other license taxes which are applicable, with only specified exceptions, to all corporations.

Hunting and fishing licenses (R13J).—Commercial and noncommercial hunting and fishing licenses and shipping permits.

Chain stores (R13K).—License taxes imposed distinctively on chain store organizations (i.e., groups of stores engaged in a similar kind of business under the same management) or upon individual units of a chain store system.

Amusements (R13L).—License taxes imposed upon amusement businesses generally or upon specific amusement enterprises (e.g., race tracks, theaters, athletic events, pool halls, etc.). "Licenses" based on value or number of admissions, amount of wagers, or gross or net income are reported elsewhere.

Occupations and businesses not elsewhere classified (R13M).—License taxes (including examination and inspection fees) required of persons engaging in particular professions, trades, or occupations, and such taxes on businesses not elsewhere classified. Includes charges relating to inspection and marketing of seed, feed, fertilizer, gasoline, oil, citrus fruit, and other commodities, as well as licenses relating to operation of particular business enterprises.

Other license taxes (R13Z).—License taxes not listed separately above (e.g., animal licenses, marriage licenses, individual permits to purchase liquor, and other nonbusiness privileges).

POLL TAXES (R14).—Capitation taxes levied as specific amounts, uniform or graded, against persons, or as ad valorem taxes on an arbitrary valuation of polls.

INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAXES (R15).—Taxes on individuals measured by net income and taxes distinctively imposed on special types of income (e.g., interest, dividends, income from intangibles, etc.). Taxes measured by income from intangible property are reported here even though locally designated as "property" taxes.

CORPORATION NET INCOME TAXES (R16).—Taxes on corporations and unincorporated businesses (when taxed distinctively from individual income) measured by net income. Such taxes may be called "license" or "franchise" taxes. However designated, they are classified here if measured by net income.

DEATH AND GIFT TAXES (R17).—Taxes imposed on the transfer of property at death, in contemplation of death, or as a gift.

SEVERANCE TAXES (R18).—Taxes imposed distinctively on removal of natural products--e.g., oil, gas, other minerals, timber, fish, etc.—from land or water and measured by value or quantity of products removed or sold.

MISCELLANEOUS TAXES (R19).—See below.

Documentary and stock transfer taxes (R19A).—Taxes on the recording, registering, and transferring of documents such as mortgages, deeds, and securities. However, taxes on recording or transfer of motor vehicles titles are reported at R13E.

Other taxes (R19Z).—Taxes not listed separately or provided for in categories above.

CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA

35- State Governments & Administration

PREAMBLE

To perpetuate the principles of free government, insure justice to all, preserve peace, promote the interest and happiness of the citizen, and transmit to posterity the enjoyment of liberty, we, the people of Georgia, relying upon the protection and guidance of Almighty God, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article I

Bill of Rights

Section I

Paragraph 1. Origin and foundation of government. All government, of right, originates with the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole. Public officers are the trustees and servants of the people, and at all times, amenable to them.

Paragraph 2. Protection the duty of government. Protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete.

Paragraph 3. Life, liberty, and property. No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law.

Paragraph 4. Right to the courts. No person shall be deprived of the right to prosecute or defend his own cause in any of the courts of this State, in person, by attorney, or both.

Paragraph 5. Benefit of counsel; accusation; list of witnesses; compulsory process; trial by jury. Every person charged with an offense against the laws of this State shall have the privilege and benefit of counsel; shall be furnished, on demand, with a copy of the accusation, and a list of the witnesses on whose testimony the charge against him is founded; shall have compulsory process to obtain the testimony of his own witnesses;shall be confronted with the witnesses testifying against him; and shall have a public and speedy trial by an impartial jury.

Paragraph 6. Crimination of self not compelled. No person shall be compelled to give testimony tending in any manner to criminate himself.

Paragraph 7. Banishment and whipping as punishment for crime. Neither banishment beyond the limits of the State, nor whipping, as a punishment for crime, shall be allowed.

Paragraph 8. Jeopardy of life or liberty more than once forbidden. No person shall be put in jeopardy of life, or liberty, more than once for the same offense, save on his, or her own motion for a new trial after conviction, or in case of mistrial.

Paragraph 9. Bail; fines; punishment; arrest, abuse of prisoners. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; nor shall any person be abused in being arrested, while under arrest, or in prison.

Paragraph 10. Costs. No person shall be compelled to pay costs except after conviction on final trial.

Paragraph 11. Habeas corpus. The writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended.

Paragraph 12. Freedom of conscience. All men have the natural and inalienable right to worship God, each according to the dictates of his own conscience, and no human authority should, in any case, control or interfere with such right of conscience.

Paragraph 13. Religious opinions; liberty of conscience. No inhabitant of this State shall be molested in person or property, or prohibited from holding any public office, or trust, on account of his religious opinions; but the right of liberty of conscience shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the State.

Paragraph 14. Appropriations to churches, sects, etc., forbidden. No money shall ever be taken from the public Treasury, directly or indirectly, in aid of any church, sect, or denomination of religionists, or of any sectarian institution.

Paragraph 15. Liberty of speech or of the press guaranteed. No law shall ever be passed to curtail, or restrain the liberty of speech, or of the press; any person may speak, write and publish his sentiments, on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty.

Paragraph 16. Searches, seizures, and warrants. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue except upon probable cause, supported by oath, or affirmation, particularly describing the place, or places, to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Paragraph 17. Slavery and involuntary servitude. There shall be within the State of Georgia neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, save as a punishment for crime after legal conviction thereof.

Paragraph 18. Status of the citizen. The social status of the citizen shall never be the subject of legislation.

Paragraph 19. Civil authority superior to military. The civil authority shall be superior to the military, and no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, except by the civil magistrate, in such manner as may be provided by law.

Paragraph 20. Contempts. The power of the Courts to punish for contempt shall be limited by legislative acts.

Paragraph 21. Imprisonment for debt. There shall be no imprisonment for debt.

Paragraph 22. Arms, right to keep and bear. The right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have the power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne.

Paragraph 23. Legislative, judicial, and executive powers, separate. The legislative, judicial and executive powers shall forever remain separate and distinct, and no person discharging the duties of one, shall, at the same time, exercise the functions of either of the others, except as herein provided.

Paragraph 24. Right to assemble and petition. The people have the right to assemble peaceably for their common good and to apply to those vested with the powers of government for redress of grievances by petition or remonstrance.

Paragraph 25. Citizens, protection of. All citizens of the United States, resident in this State, are hereby declared citizens of this State, and it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to enact such laws as will protect them in the full enjoyment of the rights, privileges and immunities due to such citizenship.

Section II

Paragraph 1. Libel; jury in criminal cases; new trials. In all prosecutions or indictments for libel the truth may be given in evidence; and the jury in all criminal cases, shall be the judges of the law and the facts. The power of the judges to grant new trials, in case of conviction, is preserved.

Paragraph 2. Treason. Treason against the State of Georgia shall consist in levying war against her; adhering to her enemies; giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason, except on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or confession in open court.

Paragraph 3. Conviction, effect of. No conviction shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture of estate.

Paragraph 4. Lotteries. All lotteries, and the sale of lottery tickets are hereby prohibited; and this prohibition shall be enforced by penal laws.

Paragraph 5. Lobbying, penalties. Lobbying is declared to be a crime, and the General Assembly shall enforce this provision by suitable penalties.

Paragraph 6. Fraud; concealment of property. The General Assembly shall have the power to provide for the punishment of fraud; and, shall provide by law, for reaching property of the debtor concealed from the creditor.

Section III

Paragraph 1. Private ways; just compensation. In case of necessity, private ways may be granted upon just compensation beigg first paid by the applicant. Private property shall not be taken, or damaged, for public purposes, without just and adequate compensation being first paid.

Paragraph 2. Attainder; ex post facto and retroactive laws, etc. No bill of attainder, ex post facto law, retroactive law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or making irrevocable grant of special privileges or immunities, shall be passed.

Paragraph 3. Revocation of tax exemptions. All exemptions from taxation heretofore granted in corporate charters are declared to be hencefore null and void.

Section IV

Paragraph 1. General laws; uniform operation; how varied. Laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the State, and no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law. No general law affecting private rights, shall be varied in any particular case, by special legislation, except with the free consent, in writing, of all persons to be affected thereby; and no person under legal disability to contract, is capable of such consent.

Paragraph 2. What acts void. Legislative acts in violation of this Constitution, of the Constitution of the United States, are void, and the Judiciary shall so declare them.

Section V

Paragraph 1. State rights. The people of this State have the inherent, sole and exclusive right of regulating their internal government, and the police thereof, and of altering and abolishing their Constitution whenever it may be necessary to their safety and happiness.

Paragraph 2. Enumeration of rights not denial of others. The enumeration of rights herein contained as a part of this Constitution shall not be construed to deny to the people any inherent rights which they may have hitherto enjoyed.

Section VI

Paragraph 1. Tidewater titles; confirmed. The Act of the General Assembly approved December 6, 1902, which extends the title of ownership of lands abutting on tidal water to low water mark is hereby ratified and confirmed.

BLACK STAR

CITY VOTERS: It may take anywhere from three to 300 of them to equal one rural voter in state elections

OUR PLUNDERED CITIES

City people make up a majority of our population, pay nearly all the taxes, but are outvoted three to one in our state legislatures. Here, says this writer, is a shocking failure in American democracy

by Lawrence Lader

"TAXATION without representation is tyranny!" cried the dignified, gray-haired speaker. The crowded meeting hall roared its approval. The meeting was taking place, not in the days of George III, but in 1949. The speaker was president of the U. S. Conference of Mayors. The audience was made up of 600 mayors from almost every big city in the country.

They had come together to launch a fight for political freedom against a new tyranny which today has resulted in one of American democracy's biggest failures.

The Boston patriots dumped King George's tea into the harbor because they refused to pay taxes to a despot who would not grant them equal representation. Today, the U. S. Conference of Mayors is protesting the same tyranny. Only now the despot is the legislatures of their own states. For, amazing as it sounds to Americans who always considered equal representation the backbone of democracy, the inhabitants of our cities have been denied this right in the legislature of almost every state.

"Equal" representation has reached the point in Connecticut where, in the eyes of the legislature, the town of Colebrook with 547 inhabitants is considered equal to the city of Hartford with a population of 166,000. Both have two House representatives. As a result of this travesty, repeated throughout the state, six per cent of the voters of Connecticut, living in over-represented rural areas, actually elect the majority of the legislature's lower house.

Los Angeles and San Francisco together make up 48 per cent of the population of California. Yet they are represented by only five per cent of the members of the upper house of the legislature. The vote of one farmer in a certain rural county is worth 350 times that of a resident of Los Angeles.

The same picture is repeated pretty much all over the country. Atlanta, Ga., has one representative for each 131,000 inhabitants; a neighboring rural county has one representative for 3,000 inhabitants. The vote of a citizen of Baltimore is worth only one-seventh of the vote of a farmer in Calvert County. Six out of seven voters in Baltimore, therefore, actually have no voice in their state government.

In the country as a whole, urban residents make up 60 per cent of the population; they produce 75 per cent of the national income; pay 90 per cent of all taxes. Yet they have only 25 per cent representation in the legislatures of their states. In general, the lack of equal representation exists in both houses of the legislature.

The result of this tyranny is that most American cities today are powerless in the grip of state legislatures dominated by the rural counties. The word tyranny is no literary exaggeration. Even the Supreme Court of Kentucky has called it that.

"Inequality of representation," declared the Court, "is a tyranny to which no people worthy of freedom will fairly submit. To say that a man in Spencer County shall have seven times as much influence as a man in Butler or Edmondson County is to say that six men out of every seven in those counties are not represented in the government at all."

It is true that the states have arguments on their side for some control over the cities. Authorities on governmental problems have pointed out that modern developments in transport and communications demand more centralization. Full efficiency and economy in certain governmental operations depend upon administration by the states. There is also the growing trend towards state responsibility for welfare and education programs in cities and local communities.

In New Hampshire and Tennessee, for example, the state government participates in the financing of old-age assistance. In Massachusetts, the state supervises all merit examinations and the civil-service systems of all cities. Other examples of assistance to cities by state governments could be cited.

Pretty Fantastic

But granted that a certain amount of such activity by the state is necessary and desirable, the incontrovertible fact remains that in hundreds of cities state interference in city affairs has been carried again and again to a tyrannical extreme.

Without equal representation, most cities have become prisoners of their states. When six rural towns with a population of 10,000 can outvote in the lower house five cities with 700,000 inhabitants, as they do in a typical state like Connecticut, the cities cannot defend themselves. All they can do is protest — and usually in vain. Countless illustrations could be cited.

The Illinois legislature has taken so much freedom from Chicago that the second largest city in the United States had to beg special permission from the state to allow peanuts to be peddled on a municipal pier.

Buffalo was told that it couldn't grant a vacation to its own policemen. It had to go, hat in hand, to the New York legislature to plead for permission.

Ohio's cities wanted to establish day nurseries for working mothers, a practical example of good municipal planning. The state legislature said no.

Self-Government Going

And Frederick, Md., probably facing the ridiculous extreme in the loss of municipal freedom, had to get a special bill passed in the state legislature to reduce the annual license fee for unspayed female dogs from $5 to $2.

These are just a few of hundreds of examples of the way the state legislatures have shackled the cities, either through constitutional amendments or restrictive charters. But the most disturbing loss of all is the loss of the right of self-government.

From the days of the first New England town meeting, Americans have met together to decide what kind of government they want and whom they want to run it. Yet today, the state legislatures have destroyed this freedom in city after city.

Take the case of Knoxville, Tenn. In 1923, its citizens voted to change from a mayor to a city manager. From then until 1937, they enjoyed clean, efficient local government — exactly what they had voted for. Suddenly, the state legislature passed a bill forcing Knoxville to replace its city manager with a mayor. But the people revolted, and succeeded in getting their city manager back. Then in 1947, the legislature passed the same bill again. A poll, taken by "The Knoxville News Sentinel," showed that the people still wanted a city manager. But the people weren't even asked. The right of 111,000 inhabitants to pick their own form of government was snatched from them — and by a legislature in which they did not even have equal representation!

Without equal representation, the cities have also become financial prisoners of their states. City after city is being pushed towards bankruptcy by legislatures which milk urban citizens of enormous taxes, but return little of the money to the local government.

A few years back, James W. Martin, Director of the Bureau of Business Research of the University of Kentucky, was driving through a West Virginia city. Suddenly he found himself in total darkness. The street lights had been turned off. He approached a cop on the corner and asked for an explanation. "No money," said the cop. Unable to believe that any city could be that broke, Martin went down to the city hall. He discovered that not only had the lights been turned off, but that the police and fire departments had been drastically reduced, health services shaved to the bone, and the welfare department completely eliminated — all because the West Virginia state legislature had recently passed a law limiting the tax rate of the city on private property, and as a result, cutting off the city from its main source of funds.

In Ohio not long ago, the state legislature reduced city revenues so drastically that Cincinnati had to give up part of its garbage collections. In Missouri, the state legislature made the St. Louis Fire Department pay a tax on the gasoline it used.

New York City, desperately in need of new sources of revenue, established a one-cent-a-pack cigarette tax a few years back. The state legislature not only forbade the city to apply the tax, but then turned around and grabbed the money for itself, making it a state tax at two cents a pack.

The "Gold-Highway Law"

But the Connecticut legislature's "gold highway" law is probably the slickest formula for starving the cities while the rural areas wax fat and prosperous. Waterbury, for instance, the fourth largest city in the state, is taxed over a million dollars annually for the state road-maintenance fund. In return, it gets back a mere $26,000 — hardly enough to mend a few holes in its 200 miles of streets.

But rural Canaan, with only 555 residents, pays in only $6,000 annually and gets back $26,000, most of which it couldn't use even if it started paving its streets with gold. As a result, Waterbury's streets grow shoddier, and Canaan has saved up $114,395 to its credit on the state books.

"It's about as democratic," commented the "Waterbury Republican," "as election day in a concentration camp."

Even Home Rule, once considered a partial bulwark against legislative tyranny, has been so badly hacked to pieces during the last 30 years that in most cities only a shell remains. Home Rule has never aimed at changing

THE U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS: "Taxation without representation is tyranny"

WIDE WORLD

PAUL V. BETTERS, Executive Director, U. S. Conference of Mayors: "THIS WEEK is rendering a distinct public service in publishing this article. In many of our states, local self-government and equal representation have ceased to exist. Only through public education will the present condition be voluntarily remedied. The challenge to our states is clear — they must become truly representative of our people. If they fail to meet the challenge, they will decay as effective agencies in our system of government."

the fundamental injustice of unequal representation. Rather, its purpose was to give the cities a limited amount of independence under a Home Rule constitutional amendment or legislation. This usually guarantees the city freedom from legislative interference in its own local affairs, gives it the right to raise revenue without legislative interference and to pick any type of local government the people desire. At least that was the theory of the men who fought for it.

First adopted in 1875 by Missouri, Home Rule charters were eventually granted in 19 states. But today, many of the limited powers reserved to the cities have already been grabbed back by the states.

Not Even Gas Stations

CONSIDER the amazing case of Ohio, where Home Rule was voted into law by the people in 1912 and where 33 cities are supposedly still enjoying its advantages. But one after another, these advantages have gradually been whittled away. In 1918, the cities lost the right to fix their own gas and electricity rates. In 1925, they lost the right to create municipal courts. By 1931, they couldn't even establish requirements for licenses to operate gas stations. Ten years later, they lost the power to prescribe qualifications for their own policemen and in 1943, the power to establish a retirement system for their firemen.

But the best case history of how a state legislature can try to tyrannize and plunder a city is the story of New Orleans. For years it was the pawn of the legislature, dominated by the Long machine. Its debt was scandalous; its police department reeked with graft. Gambling dens and houses of prostitution operated wide open, milking the people of $30,000,000 a year. Forty-eight hundred slot machines took in millions more, a large slice eventually finding its way into official pockets.

Then, in 1946, a 34-year-old war veteran named deLesseps (Chep) Morrison caused a political sensation by defeating the Long machine and winning the election for mayor. Immediately he fought to restore order and independence to the city.

The Freedom Was Gone

HE CLOSED the gambling dens and the "houses," ran slot machines out of business. He shook up the Police Department so thoroughly that some 200 officers resigned and were replaced by war veterans. He put over a $41,000,000 public-works program, opened up 56 new playgrounds for the kids, brought in millions of dollars of new business to the Port of New Orleans, and inaugurated open, weekly meetings of the city commission. For the people who had voted in Morrison's reform administration, it looked like the dawn of freedom.

What happened next has been described by Lennox L. Moak, executive director of the Bureau of Governmental Research, as "the rape of New Orleans." The legislature rammed through one bill after another aimed at hamstringing the administration and turning it into chaos. One bill abolished the municipal courts and then re-established them under the legislature's thumb. Another destroyed the state civil-service merit system over the protest of business, labor and religious organizations. A third bill tried to bankrupt the administration by chopping the sales tax in half. Perhaps worst of all, the legislature completely abolished the five-man city commission, elected at large, which had been a major reform secured by the people after years of struggle. In its place, it put a seven-man council elected by districts, with each councilman heading up a specific department. It was a plan aimed at bringing back the lush "pork barrel" days of graft and inefficiency.

"To my knowledge," said Mayor Morrison, "there is no more flagrant and punitive case history of interference in purely local affairs . . ."

Battle for Survival

LUCKILY for New Orleans, "Chep" Morrison fought the legislature, blow for blow. When the legislature's new amendments were offered to the voters at the last election, he toured the city and most of the state, rousing thousands of people against them. Some of the most flagrant power grabs were defeated. But New Orleans, under Morrison's leadership, is still involved in a nip-and-tuck battle for survival.

Looking back to 1787, it seems clear that the cities became prisoners of the state legislatures through a peculiar twist of economic history. When the Federal Constitution was written, only five per cent of the population was urban. None of its authors dreamed that this figure would some day zoom to 60 per cent. As a result, the Constitution carefully protects the rights of the states against the Federal government, but makes no mention of the rights of the cities, which were only unimportant economic specks scattered along the seaboard.

Can't Force It

THE most frightening result is that this tyranny has become self-perpetuating. Since the cities were denied equality of representation from the start, they have never had the votes in the legislature to force reapportionment every 10 years.

In Texas, for instance, the constitution calls for reapportionment every 10 years. But the legislature has refused to act. Dallas, therefore, which has mushroomed from 160,000 in 1920 to over 370,000 today, has perhaps 200,000 inhabitants without a vote in the lower house.

In the country as a whole, state legislatures have blocked re-apportionment anywhere from 20 to 131 years. Connecticut has had no re-apportionment since 1818. Except for slight changes in 1870, Tennessee has not acted since 1834, Illinois since 1909, Minnesota since 1919. Seventeen other states have ignored re-apportionment for over 20 years.

To make the tyranny even more complete, many legislatures have made it almost impossible for the people to get equal representation by amending the constitution. In states like Delaware and Connecticut, no petitions from the people are allowed.

If the cities of Connecticut, for instance, want to pass an amendment, they will have to get a majority of the lower house to propose it, then get two thirds of the members of both houses to back it at the next session. Only a miracle could pass such an amendment, for it would mean that the rurally dominated legislature would have to vote against itself.

This does not mean that the tyranny of the legislatures will maintain its stranglehold on the country forever. A few cities have already won back some of their rights. In Seattle, where there had been no re-apportionment for 30 years and such unequal representation that 166,000 of its inhabitants in one district had the same representation as two neighboring counties with 6,000 inhabitants, the people have already carried the fight to the ballot box.

Seattle Won Out

LUCKILY, Washington's constitution provides for an initiating petition to place an amendment on the ballot. Seattle drew up its petition, and then voted for it overwhelmingly on election day. As a result, it is now one of the few cities in the country whose representation in the legislature is almost proportionate to its population.

When the cities of Michigan were facing financial starvation by the legislature recently, they fought back with the same strategy. Acting together, they placed an amendment on the ballot calling for a return of part of the state-collected sales tax to the cities. They campaigned for it so successfully that it won by a 200,000 majority.

Probably the brightest cause for hope during the last year was the election in two states of progressive governors who have pledged themselves to fight along with the cities to end unequal representation.

In Illinois, Govenor Adlai E. Stevenson was elected by a 575,000 majority in 1948 on a platform which pledged constitutional reform and an end to the unequal representation which has given Cook County, Chicago, with over half the population of the state, only 57 out of 153 members of the lower house of the legislature, and only 19 out of 51 in the upper. The governor has already forced the issue to a vote in the rurally dominated legislature, and lost. But this is only the first round in a long, tough battle.

Rural Tyranny

IN CONNECTICUT, Governor Chester Bowles has lashed out continually against the destructive effect of the tyranny of unequal representation on the cities. In the educational-aid bill, only $30 per pupil was allotted children in cities, $110 per pupil to children in the rural areas. In the aid bill for school buildings, only $50,000 was given Hartford with 166,000 inhabitants. The town of Union with 234 inhabitants received the same amount!

On a national level, the fight against the tyranny of the state legislatures is being led by the American Municipal Association, the National Municipal League, and the militant U. S. Conference of Mayors.

Unfortunately, there is no pat solution, no easy answer. The tyranny is so complete that the struggle for re-apportionment by a vote of the legislature or by constitutional amendment may be a slow, agonizing process, lasting for years.

Drastic Action

A POSSIBLE quick solution is now being considered by the U. S. Conference of Mayors. It would be a drastic lawsuit to force the states to give the cities equal representation. Its legal basis would be the Fourteenth Amendment, which says that no state can "abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens" or "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." If and when the legal action starts, it will probably be fought through to the Supreme Court and may prove one of the most dramatic suits in U.S. legal history.

A victory by the cities could set off a series of explosions making the original Boston Tea Party look like a dress rehearsal. The End

THIS ISSUE

This issue of the Bulletin consists of abstracts of some of the papers read before the Twenty-Third Annual Institute held in Chicago August 4 and 5, 1944. Further abstracts will be printed in the next issue, including those of Louis Wirth and Philip Hauser.

GRADUATE SOCIAL RESEARCH

A Bulletin devoted almost entirely to news of graduate students and abstracts of their research will be issued approximately the first of April. The editors request all graduate students both at the University of Chicago and elsewhere to submit news of their research projects and/or other activities of interest to the Society, and abstracts from two to three hundred words in length of current or completed research projects which might appear in this issue of the Bulletin. Such abstracts should be sent in duplicate to Editor, Society for Social Research not later than March First.

NEWS OF THE AUTHORS

Ethel Mae Bratton is now Personnel Research Analyst with Office of Indian Affairs.

Gordon Brown is associated with the War Relocation Authority in Arizona.

Werner J. Cahnman of Fisk University, Nashville, is studying a Nashville, Tennessee Jewish community and two Nashville Negro churches.

John F. Embree is now with the War Relocation Authority.

Philip M. Hauser, associated with the Bureau of the Census in Washington, is studying the impact of the war on the population of the United States.

William E. Henry is associated with the Committee on Human Development at the University of Chicago.

Joseph D. Lohman is engaged in a study with Herbert Blumer of anti-Semitism among Negroes.

George Lundberg is Professor of Sociology at Bennington College.

Will O'Neil is director of The Chicago Sun's Yanks Service Bureau.

H. H. Remmers is director of the Division of Educational Reference, Purdue University, now sponsoring the Purdue Opinion Poll for Young People.

Mulford Q. Sibley of the University of Illinois is making a study of conscientious objectors under the auspices of the Special Committee on Civil Liberties of the Social Science Research Council and of the Pacifist Research Bureau.

Edwin H. Sutherland continues his research on the criminality of certain large corporations of the United States.

Sgt. Kerson Weinberg is a member of the United States Army.

Malcom M. Willey is Vice-President of the University of Minnesota.

Kurt H. Wolff, now of Earlham College, continues to work on his material gathered last summer at San Cristobal, New Mexico.

SOCIOLOGY, SCIENCE AND EDUCATION

Malcom M. Willey

The war has had its disruptive effect upon the organization and personnel through which in pre-war days systematic study in the social sciences, including sociology, was carried on. The problem arises as to what changes are to proceed, and should proceed, from this in the post-war years.

Examination of the files of major sociological journals shows that the controversy relating to the nature of sociology as a science is a dominant theme. To debate what sociology should be as a science is largely fruitless in contributing to its development. The further and useful advance of the subject is most likely to come, not through abstract discussion of what the science is or ought to be, but rather through continuous attention to the analysis of specific problems, with all possible exactness and at whatever methodological level is possible, to the end that verifiable answers may be given to questions- even minute questions--that relate to problems that sociologists claim as theirs for study.

Read Bain has distinguished four levels of scientific methodology: (1) illuminative insight, (2) logic--systematic analysis, (3) organizing concepts and (4) delimited empirical reserrch. The last is the one upon which sociological research should proceed after the war. It may be further subdivided however, into three levels, (a) simple accurate description with limited generalization, (b) quantitative measurement with limited generalization and, (c) broad generalization and possibly the emergence of a social law. The second of these is likely to prove most fruitful. After sufficient studies of this kind have been made, research may proceed to the higher levels, but the concrete studies are the immediate requirement.

THE PROSPECTS OF POST WAR SOCIAL RESEARCH

George Lundberg

One badly needed type of research which it is hoped will flourish after the war along with old and established types is research in human communication. It will probably be pursued on at least three levels:

1. Broad inquiries into the more obvious aspects of communication such as freedom of the press.
2. The guaging of public opinion through polls of various kinds.
3. Less spectacular research in linguistics and semiotics.

The amount of social research and its financing will be dependent upon the general post-war economic and tax structure, and the attitude adopted toward social research by government and business. If research is regarded as an indispensable part of public administration it will be supported on an unprecedented scale.

The problems selected in organized and corporate research will be those in which the responsible spokesmen of the supporting organizations are interested. From this point of view, government as the accredited guardian of the public interest should be the ideal sponsor. If an increasing proportion of social research is to be conducted under governmental auspices, there will be a problem of undue devotion to immediate needs rather than long-time programs, but it need not be acute. The problem of bias must be met as in all research, but since techniques have been developed for detecting and correcting it, it will not be more of a problem in governmentally sponsored research than in research under other auspices.

More dangerous than increased governmental support and control of research is the low conception many social scientists have of their task. Many are chiefly interested in the program of some pressure group. This is permissible, but pure science must also be permissible and indeed encouraged.

A METHODOLOGICAL NOTE ON THE EMPIRICAL ESTABLISHMENT OF CULTURE PATTERNS

Kurt H. Wolff

The first of two approaches to the scientific study of culture is the "objective" approach exemplified by most anthropological monographs. In it the central concept is scientific procedure, the personal equation being recognized merely as an evil to be eliminated. The second is the "cultural" approach implied in some theoretically oriented anthropological writings and in the sociology of knowledge. In it, the central concept is the personal or cultural equation, the scientific procedure being taken for granted.

In the cultural approach, in contrast to the objective approach, the work is not largely predetermined by contentual rules: rather, the concept of pattern overrides contentual distinctions. There are two steps in the study of a culture by this method: preliminary comparison of the culture with the students' own, leading to its preliminary classification and to the formation of expectations regarding the types of patterns to be found, and the establishment of patterns. Hypothetical patterns are arrived at through observation and tentative interpretation, and verified by immanent interpretation, that is, by the recording of the interpretations of the members of the culture and the establishment of the interrelatedness of the patterns in such a way as to enable comprehension and prediction. Classification of the patterns and of the culture may then proceed.

The methodological elements in such a study are:

a. Presentation of statistically reliable background materials and of the connection between these and the patterns.
b. Presentation of patterns and of their immanent interpretation.
c. Demonstration of the application of the patterns to individuals, groups, or all members of the culture.
d. Demonstration of the connection between the patterns and culture types: the problems of history and culture change (especially important in the study of folk cultures).

e. Demonstration of the adequacy of the patterns for the understanding and prediction of the culture, by discussion of negative cases and of alternative interpretations of materials and patterns.
f. Classification of the culture in terms of types of cultures or of other theories.

PROJECTIVE TECHNIQUES IN THE STUDY OF CHARACTER PATTERNS OF PRIMITIVE AND MODERN PEOPLES

William E. Henry

In recent years the schools of thought that view personality in its dynamic and emotional aspects have become more prominent and have begun to make significant contributions to the problems of the social sciences. Two aspects of the developing personality are central: the process of socialization and the process of individualization, in which,in turn, four components are distinguishable, the universal, the communal, the role and the idiosyncratic components. To reveal these, the so-called projective techniques have been devised by means of which an attempt is made to elicit the individual's private world of meanings.

The two techniques which seem most adaptable to the study of character patterns of primitive peoples are the Rorschach Technique and the Thematic Apperception Technique. The latter was used in studies of children in eleven Indian communities, begun in 1942 under the Office of Indian Affairs and The Committee on Human Development of the University of Chicago. In regard to the general psychological characteristics of the various cultures, it was used to probe the orientation toward the physical world, adult pressure, authority systems, the characteristics of interpersonal relations, sex roles, family roles, spontaneity as against restraint, acculturat on processes, age trends, and intra-tribal variations.

THE INDIAN AS A MINORITY GROUP

Ethel Mae Bratton

To understand the Indian, one must see the past which has shaped his personality and character. According to Chester E. Faris, if it be granted that mankind developed in the Himalaya region, the Indian had courage, endurance, and curiosity greater than any other since the distance of its travel exceeds that of the other races combined. This seems to be borne out by the fact that in the course of four and a half centuries of mistreatment by the whites the Indians have remained a strong people.

In the early seventeenth century, there was an estimated full-blooded Indian population of 900,000. Now, there are about 377,000

THE INDIAN AS A MINORITY GROUP (cont'd.)

Indians, a third of them full-bloods, and they are increasing at a considerably faster rate than the general population. They should survive, and to play an increasing role. They are a heterogeneous people, but the more than two hundred tribes share certain important values, including profound religious feeling, brotherhood, generosity, and democracy.

Mr. Collier's article on "America's Handling of its Indigenous Indian Minority", discusses government treatment of them. It was most inept until recent decades, hence the Indians were poor and disorganized. Since 1924 a strong health service has been set up, a complete investigation of Indian policies made, the educational and welfare systems improved, and finally in 1934 the Indian Reorganization Act passed, changing Indian policy radically in the direction of self-determination and self-government.

The Indian problem is not solved, however. Unfulfilled treaty obligations, for example in regard to education, the withholding of full citizenship and discrimination in regard to employment and housing, point to a still existing discrepancy between democratic ideals and American practices in regard to the Indian minority.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROBLEMS CAUSED BY INSECURITY AMONG JAPANESE AND JAPANESE AMERICANS

Gordon Brown

In Relocation Centers, problems arise where they are least expected, as a result of internal camp conditions. Examples include crises proceeding from changes in employment policy which were introduced without sufficient warning or sufficient appreciation of the unique social groups within the camp, and changes in hospital administration which threatened group solidarities. The root of the matter seems to be that a shocked population is involved, which lacks all security, economic, social, political, and legal, and which must be rehabilitated.

COMMUNITY ANALYSIS--AN EXAMPLE OF ANTHROPOLOGY IN GOVERNMENT

John F. Embree

The War Relocation Authority, charged with caring for persons forced to leave restricted military areas, instituted Community Analysis partly because of serious internal crises in two of its ten relocation centers. The population of these was chiefly Japanese, and the incidents occurred because of lack of understanding of community problems. After the solution of these and the recruitment of trained and experienced sociologists and anthropologists as personnel, such questions were attacked as why the combined Army--WRA registration program caused considerable trouble, why the resistance of evacuees to the relocation program was strong, and how segregation could be carried out in such a way as to avoid crises at the centers in connection with it. Numerous special requests were handled, and special reports prepared. The program seems to have demonstrated the usefulness of the techniques developed by anthropology and sociology to the administration.

A number of problems of an administrative character arose concerning the program, that of placing the analyst in the administrative hierarchy in such a way as to afford reasonably effective communication between him and his director and to minimize hostility between him, his fellow-workers and the evacuees being of particular interest to the social scientist.

NORTH AFRICA -- PROBLEM FOR THE FUTURE

Werner J. Cahnman

The geographical conditions of North Africa have afforded sufficient isolation for ancient customs and particular creeds to be preserved, but insufficient political power for frequent invasion and outside intervention to be warded off. Hence it is a melting pot of Nordic, Semitic, and Negroid blood, but the three major ingredients are still discernible in tribal and religious affiliations. The various ethnic groups--Arab, Negro, Jewish, European--are economically as interdependent as social classes would be in our society, but with the exception of the Negroes have preserved their cultural heritages in spite of economic contacts.

In 1848, the tolerant policy adopted when France moved into Algeria in 1830, was replaced by a policy of complete assimilation into the French state. The latter proved inapplicable, with the result that the French settlers were treated as an integral part of France and the native inhabitants relegated to colonial status in all but name.

The record of French colonization has been impressive in regard to economic prosperity and population increase, but not in regard to the cultural issues. The French have assimilated other European elements well, but pursued a divisive policy with the natives. The native Jews were given French citizenship in 1871, but anti-Semitism has increased among the French colonists because of Jewish competition. The Berber tribes have remained distinct in face of a policy wavering between self-government and assimilation. The Moslem problem has not been solved by repeated attempts to dissociate the elite from the masses.

At the present time, the European population is concentrated in the cities while the rural population is overwhelmingly native. The native population is increasing at a far more rapid rate than the European, and the earlier movement of real estate from native to European ownership has been reversed. This suggests the end of aggressive European colonization, and the necessity of France's cooperating with Arabs and Berbers on the basis of separate status in private law and complete equality in public law if she is to retain her North African possessions.

PROBLEMS OF ADJUSTMENT IN ARMY UNITS (1)

Sgt. S. Kirson Weinberg

The conversion in army camps of peaceful, relatively individualistic citizens into well-organized military units obviously implies changes in their personal attitudes. Combat troops are particularly affected. At times these changes may seemingly be limited to the acquisition of new skills and to an affected manner, but the transformation occurring in the newly formed communities of young men is deeper.

Data secured from certain tank destroyer camps in early and advanced stages of training including men placed in special battalions because unable to keep pace with their companies shows (1) The effects of the collective military process upon the soldiers' personality (2) some emergent types of personal variance.

The indivisible social aims of a military unit are effective control of its members and intense group solidarity. As training occurs, effective control will arise and become sustained by the indigenous attitudes of the participant soldiers. It must make the military unit paramount to all other group influences, the individual soldier sensitive to the group's demands. From the start the trainee is on the defensive with reference to his leaders and group, knowing the leaders and his fellow trainees to be critical in evaluating him. Within the relatively isolated company, which is a work-habitat continuum, both his military performances and his informal conduct are exposed and readily weighed by the others. Initially, the trainee's reactions to the army vary according to previous background, prior military training and civilian attitudes toward the army.

Only gradually do the officers and non-coms become able to serve as levers in winning the group and releasing group disapproval upon deviants. Often the men tend to become enraged with a superior after a scolding or to become depressed and feel incompetent.

The focus of group attention upon deviants places them in an awkward position and awakens the desire for conformity, especially in repeated formations and manual-of-arms drill. These mass drills accustom the men to respond uniformly and precisely as integral parts of groups, generates group identity and offers opportunities for publicly correcting the mal-conformer. Fellow soldiers may become antagonistic and he, in turn, feels their hostility in some way. A group retaliation for some form of deviant behavior, or penalization of a group for the misbehavior of a few gives a group dimension to many individual activities. A personal challenge, such as the company commander's censure of the poor results of his company in competition puts pressure upon the enlisted personnel.

Besides uniformity in appearance and in response to commands,

(1) Completed paper published in January '45 issue of the American Journal of Sociology

the range of conformity in some includes the wish to become militarily anonymous. Except for seeking favorable notice from those in authority the men attempt to avert attention from themselves by avoiding erratic behavior. This attitude to a degree extends to formal relations. In every type of drill he is subject to commands which he must instantly obey. To respond precisely he finds it vital to have his wits about him, and this precludes personal preoccupation. Later this routine, however, may become so mechanical that the individual responds unthinkingly.

Although personal griping and complaining thrive among soldiers, particularly during tense situations, these personal difficulties do not infringe upon the performance and duty standards of the group. Griping becomes a means of working off discontent, but it cannot excuse bad performance. When personal problems do interfere with duty, they elicit a patient tolerance or humorous indifference. Individuals who indiscriminately relate their difficulties to others soon change.

This collective attitude thrusts out personal sentiments from an approved communicative level and seems indispensible to group control. It retains the censure of other soldiers for bad performance and prevents the arousal of personal insecurities among others who would be influenced by the particular individual. It deters the corrosion of group standards and collective determination. Indeed, the tendency reverses itself. The humor with which personal difficulties are evaluated turns inward. The individual soldier responds overtly to his difficulties as he sees others react.

Combat becomes a consummation of their activity and an outlet from their arduous, monotonous preparation. Since many must expend their "all" in this training, they become impatient with deviants, and this makes for an intensified social control. The hesitant or uncertain officer incurs disrespect of his men. Competence and courage displayed by the officer may cause the men to overlook the officer's undue severity. Group solidarity thus begins to evolve into a meaningful identity, the trainee by continuous participation with intact groups conceiving himself in terms of his particular soldierly function. The other soldiers become persons among whom he has a definite social role rather than strangers.

PROBLEMS OF THE RETURNING SERVICE MAN

Will O'Neil

Most people attack the veteran problem from a single angle--that of readjustment of the veteran to the civilian community. We must begin thinking in terms of adjusting the civilian population as well. Underneath the new civilian clothing of the veteran is still the man who has been taught to kill, who has lived under rigid discipline, who, in the case of enlisted men, has been taught to do what he is told, and not to think what he should do. The social standards of normal society have virtually disappeared and have been replaced by the standard of military life where there are definite classes of society insuring a certain type of security for every individual.

Some employers have taken definite steps to meet the problem of psychologic or psychiatric readjustment of those veterans who require it. Included in these programs are education of foremen and supervisors to the handling of the men, and placement of the men in jobs which will not increase their disabilities. Too many employers, on the other hand, refuse to think of hiring the man who gives any evidence or indication that he had a psychiatric problem which made him unsuitable for Army life. They fail to consider a man declared unsuitable for military life is not necessarily unfit for civilian life.

One interesting feature is now being developed by the Air Forces in connection with the remating of combat air crew men and their wives. Colonel Howard A. Rusk, father of the AAF program, discovered on a recent trip to one of the AAF Convalescent Training Centers that pilots furloughed home returned to the hospital before their leaves expired, because they were unable to make an adjustment to the women they had married shortly before, or even some months before, their leaving for service. Colonel Rusk interviewed the wives and the pilots in an effort to arrive at a sound program to correct this situation. Schools for wives are now in the process of being established by the AAF. Occupational therapy now includes activities pointed towards increasing a man's manual skills.

The recently enacted Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 is an example of the economic and political thinking of those who are behind the passage of veteran's regulations. Veterans are offered such things as college education, money to start a business, unemployment compensation if they are out of work, a promise that every effort will be exerted in getting them jobs, etc. But virtually nothing is offered in the way of facilities for the broader problems of readjustment of the great mass of men who will come back from the war. Under the bill, colleges and universities, banking and mortgage companies are to be the government's handmaidens in settling the readjustment problem. Veterans will rush to colleges by the thousands. While the bill permits the school to determine the eligibility for entrance of veteran candidates, this clause, I think, will become a farce. This Bill of Rights is something of a fraud in terms of what soldiers may feel is guaranteed them. The fact that a man has lain in a fox hole for months or even years dreaming of his own home or his own business or his own farm does not by any means indicate that he is capable of managing any of it.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS IN PRISON

Mulford Q. Sibley

This paper constitutes a brief discussion of one phase of the study of COs in the United States during the second World War. The Selective Service Act of 1940 authorized alternative service for those conscientiously opposed on a religious basis to combatant and non-combatant service, and non-combatant posts in the armed services for those opposed only to combat positions. As is true of those subject to military service, COs are under legal obligation to register.

Five rather distinct locations of objectors have been (1) those who have conformed to the registration provisions of the law, but for some reason--age, physical condition, occupational deferment, and so on--find themselves in no official CO category; (2) those given 4E, and sent to a Civilian Public Service Camp; (3) those given 1A-O and, since 1943, become medical corpsmen; (4) those sent into the army as regular soldiers, but who either claim conscientious objection on entry and refuse to wear a uniform or take an oath, or become conscientious objectors after formal entry into the army; and, (5) those who, for conscientious reasons, will not conform to the law and are sentenced to civil prisons.

The number of men COs in the U. S. outside civilian and military prisons number approximately 152,000. This includes no estimate of women objectors which would probably double the above amount. 2071 of 6116 individual violations of the Selective Service Act are listed as being based on conscientious objections. Of more than 3500 COs in prison in 1944, about two-thirds were Jehovah's Witnesses. These JWs play a significant part in developing American public law and raising many problems of church-state relationships. Their percentage continues to rise. Among the Witnesses a man can be recognized as a minister without giving up his secular occupation. The local boards, often hostile to JWs for other reasons as well, refuse to accept the 4D (ministerial) classification so often requested. They are non-pacificist objectors because their pattern of resistance is based upon an expediential interpretation of their religion--this war not being the Battle of Armageddon where the forces of good are allied in the battle against the devil's regiments. They are imprisoned in allied and axis countries alike throughout the world.

The second largest group constitutes those who refused their requested 4E (CO) classification, preferring prison to the army. Most of them would be free in Civilian Public Service camps had a common agreement as to the meaning of "religious training and belief" been reached by the local draft boards. Opposition to conscription as well as to war manifested in refusal to register or report for physical exams, etc., causes a third relatively smaller group. A small, but ever-increasing group includes those who can no longer conscientiously do "work of national importance" under "civilian direction" in CPS camps.

Considering that all COs are eligible for parole after a relatively short prison term, probation as a penal sanction has been utilized by a few judges. The law permits sentences up to 5 years. Length of the average sentence soared and fell with the coming and going of the Pearl Harbor catastrophe. Many judges are puzzled by the problem of their COs and some will go into great detail and almost apologize when giving sentence.

The second largest religious faith consists of 200 Negro Moslems, most of whom refused to register. Catholics and Methodists stand relatively high, the former because so many don't understand how a Catholic can be a CO.

Prison experiences of conscientious objectors may involve the following consequences: (a) Many COs will be far more conscious of social issues than before. (b) Many will feel that prison experience with its opportunity to teach and enlighten is more worthwhile than CPS functions. (c) Many COs will provide leadership in post-war prison reform movements.

ILLEGAL BEHAVIOUR OF SEVENTY CORPORATIONS

Edwin H. Sutherland

Decisions by courts and commissions against the seventy largest industrial and mercantile corporations, excluding petroleum corporations, under antiturst, false advertising, infringement of patent, copyrights and trademarks laws, and the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, were studied for two purposes. The first was to secure evidence as to the extent of certain types of crime in the upper socio-economic class for correcting the belief that crime is concentrated in the lower socio-economic class. The second was to formulate a more adequate explanation of criminal behavior than can be secured when attention is restricted to one segment of it.

Every one of the seventy corporations has one or more decisions against it, with a total of 547 and an average of 7.8. This excludes 133 supplementary actions which did not result or have not yet resulted in adverse decrees. Twelve have adverse decisions under each of the four laws, 17 under three laws, 30 under two, and 11 under one. The greater part of the convictions, even when violations of the NLRA are omitted, have occurred since 1935. Probably because of the difficulty of discovering cases in the earlier decades, and of the increased facilities and vigor of the enforcement agencies, which in turn may be attributed to the loss of status of business men resulting from the depression.

The enumeration of decisions is incomplete. It is confined almost entirely to actions taken by Federal courts and commissions, and among those to actions included in the Federal Reporter. Some decisions are reported without enough identification to be traceable. Some subsidiaries of the corporations are not included. The Pure Food and Drug Administration does not publish its decisions by names of corporations. The enumeration is inadequate also in that it conceals the long duration of many of the offenses on which decisions were made. Finally, even all decisions which have been made would presumably be only a small fraction of the crimes committed.

On the other hand, some persons may say that only 49 of the decisions, those made by criminal courts, show criminal behavior, because in the other cases either the laws violated were not criminal laws or the decisions were not based on the principles of criminal intent and burden of proof. This raises several important questions. One is whether illegal behavior is criminal only when it is defined in specific laws as criminal and when it is under the jurisdiction of a criminal court. It seems that even though it may not be good politics for legislatures to define the behavior of powerful business groups as criminal, that should make no difference in the sociologist's definition of crime. The criterion of criminal behavior is that it is a violation of a legal code provided for the protection of society. Assuming this definition, the offenses studied are of the same class as murder and kidnaping.

Second, although cognizance should be taken of the distinction between "intentional" and "accidental" acts, and between violations of laws which are known and understood and those which are not, these distinctions do not differentiate criminal law from other law, since criminal intent is not uniform in all types of laws even by the most legalistic interpretation.

Third, "burden of proof" should have the same significance in criminology that it has in any other scientific work, namely, the facts should be established as facts.

In view of these conclusions regarding definition, more than 90 per cent of the decisions against the 70 corporations under these four laws reflect criminal behavior, and the decisions therefore have considerable reliability as an index.

Certain hypothesis can be made which seem valid with reference to the criminal behavior both of corporations and of the lower socio-economic class. (1) The number of violations of a particular law by a particular corporation or other group of persons is a function of its position in the social structure. (This is attested by the clustering of several corporations in the same industry around one point in the distribution of decisions, and by the continuance of illegal policies over a long period during which the personnel of the corporation change almost entirely.)

(2) A corporation's position in the economic structure determines the number of violations of a particular law by (a) determining the opportunity to violate the law and the need to violate the law in a relatively external sense, and (b) defining the need and making accessible the techniques for satisfying it, in a socio-psychological sense.

(3) The organization of the State for the enforcement of a particular law is inversely proportional to the status of the group which violates that law.

BLACK MARKET

Joseph D. Lohman

There is a fear that the country may be flooded with counterfeit money turned out by men who have learned their trade through producing bogus ration stamps for the Black Market. One of the effects of rationing has been to give "new and added employment to counterfeiters."

Recent arrests have produced evidence that such professionals are now organized as an incident of the Black Market rackets. The federal government has recently indicted a number of ration stamp counterfeiters who also possessed exceptionally fine plates for the printing of United States currency. Government officials are already speculating on the prospects of an increased currency counterfeiting problem as a result of the impetus given the trade in recent months.

Behind the countless Black Market violations in this country lies the fact that the war has never been sufficiently close to home, either geographically or psychologically, to check the pursuit for private profit, let alone to make criminal a devoted father's provision of a thick juicy steak for the family dinner. As in the case of prohibition period, the establishment of price controls and rationing has been accompanied by widespread violation by both consumers and merchants throughout the community and irrespective of social class or economic status.

The public saves itself from self-indictment by identifying the Black Market, not so much as a set of practices, as a place, a place where questionable and illegal traffic is carried on. In this added qualification any individual relieves himself of the burden of being labled a Black Marketeer. The behavior has become identified with a place, some other place, frequented by other, not so nice, people. OPA violations are overwhelmingly committed by individuals and firms of conventional status and reputation.

War or not war, the American public is confronted by a system of administered prices which is at variance with the traditional pursuit after private profit. Preoccupation of the OPA with certain classes of offenders is no mere accident. Indeed, its handful of investigators, some 2,500 for the country, is in the tradition of business pressure against government to retain a maximum of freedom and minimum of governmental intervention.

There is a saying among confidence men that there is a 'bit of larceny in everyone'. I suspect this is not so much a generalization about human nature as it is a comment on our culture. In connection with nearly every controlled or rationed item there has appeared some form of sharp-shooting and bootlegging. However, at the present time there is little evidence of a really systematic, organized, criminal enterprise involved in this type of larcenous activity.

The current OPA concern is the gasoline market. Enforcement officials are making a two-pronged drive--against gas ration stamp counterfeiting and the systematic burglarizing of ration board offices for coupons. For the most part, the filling station dealer is under pressure from "muscle" men to accept counterfeit stamps, which he turns in to replenish supplies after selling gasoline at high prices without demanding stamps. The dealer's rewards are too small to account for his violations other than by considering the pressure put on him by the so-called "cowboy" type hoodlum and hangers-on of the criminal underworld. Also, there have been an extremely large number of thefts of ration stamps and books by employees of ration boards. On the face of it this would appear as a petty larceny aspect of "white collar" crime. However, these thefts appear to be promoted from the outside and are not unrelated to the fact that ration board personnel has been selected through war political channels with their characteristic loyalities, obligations and underworld associations. Indeed, the number of instances in which the "fix" or a mere discharge has disposed of a well-established theft of stamps from a ration board is itself evidence that the local ward heeling politician is on the job. The feeling on the part of local ration board employees that their responsibility is to, and their hope of wage increases is from, their local political sponsors, is well known.

THE CENSUS AS AN INSTRUMENT OF DEMOCRACY IN THE POST-WAR WORLD

Phillip M. Hauser

While post-war reaction may be expected against government controls, it is to the interest of the general public as well as to economic enterprise that the statistical service function of government be preserved as an important element in our democratic way of life.

The basic need and justification for a systematic program of government statistics lies in the fact that in our urban industrialized interdependent economy, the individual person or enterprise in the absence of facts frequently does not know how to act in his or its own interest, let alone in the interest of the larger social or economic order. Statistics relating to the population, labor, housing and construction, production, inventories, shipments, sales, foreign trade, government finances, and related matters may be regarded as traffic signals on the heavily traveled economic highways of our highly complex society. It may be argued that without such traffic signals the economic freedom we enjoy under the American scheme of free enterprise is jeopardized by the possibility of head-on economic collisions of the type we experienced during the great depression. Government statistics, in general, and the census statistics program, in particular, are essential to this in that they help to maximize individual freedom of action within a framework of activity which provides insurance against unnecessary and undesirable risks either by the individual person or enterprise or by the body politic.

Not only a desirable but a necessary function of our government in facilitating intelligent post-war day-to-day activity will be to collect information relating to our social and economic life and to make such information readily obtainable to all.

THE PURDUE OPINION POLL FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

H. H. Remmers

The Purdue Opinion Poll for Young People is unique in that the participating school pay for the poll as a service. Some 20,000 senior high school pupils participated last year. The poll has served the following purposes: (1) a guide for evaluating the process of education; (2) a catalytic agent and revitalizing force in the social studies; (3) data for the study and prediction of trend; (4) a vantage point from which to explore the factors that change, make, and unmake attitudes, interests, wants and needs of youth; (5) at least a starting point for more effective community integration; (6) during the war emergency, an important part of the psychological front; and (7) a positive contribution to social psychology with respect to content, research methodology and theory.

Research in progress and contemplated is presented under two headings (a) methodological and (b) social-psychological. Under the heading of methodological problems are listed (1) anonymous paper-and-pencil versus interview polling, (2) form and content of poll items, (3) reliability of measurement, (4) polling by radio, and (5) evaluation of poll.

NEWS OF RESEARCH AND ACTIVITIES (cont'd.)

Edwin E. Aubrey newly-elected president of Crozer Theological Seminary in Chester, Pa., has been studying the relationship of the concept of natural law to Christian ethics. Most significant we feel is his expressed aim of providing more training in social studies for future ministers.

Reinhard Bendix is concerned with problems of bureaucracy and the development of business ideology during the war.

Vattel E. Daniel is interested in the development of a Sociology of religion and some of Sociology's contributions to successful education. He has recently accepted a position of Dean at State Teachers College, Montgomery, Alabama.

At Tuskegee Institute Ralph N. Davis' two current research projects have been the Negro Newspaper and Tuskegee Institute: A Social and Economic Interpretation.

Walter N. Eaton writes that he is making an attempt to formulate a sociological theory of motivation which will be amenable to quantitative research.

Robert E. L. Faris lists his research projects as 1) continuity of generations and child behaviour 2) aspects of isolation and contact related to personality.

S. C. Gilfillan has been studying the social effects of aviation in a comprehensive research project at the University of Chicago.

Joseph B. Gittler is making a Des Moines community study and is studying the adjustment of college wives in war time.

Ernest Harper has been named head of a new department of Social Service which was split from the Sociology Department at Michigan State College.

Elmer W. Henderson continues in his post as Regional Director of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practices.

M. R. Ireland lists his research project as "Bohemia".

Guy B. Johnson has resigned his position with the University of North Carolina and is now executive director of the Southern Regional Council.

Robert C. Jones now with Pan American Union in Washington, D.C., is concerned with education for social work in Latin America and recruitment and transportation of Mexican Nationals for labor in the United States.

Murray J. Leiffer has been studying retirement and recruitment rates in the ministry and criteria of effectiveness in the ministry.

Peter P. Lejins is engaged in a crime and delinquency survey in the state of Maryland.

Ernest Mannheim is concerned with juvenile deliquency at the University of Kansas City.

Vera Miller is now working in the Research department of the Amalgamed Clothing Workers of America.

Margaret B. Phalman is interested in race and ethnic ideologies and their manifestations in dominant groups.

Otto Pollak is now with the War Labor Board in Philadelphia. He has been studying the problems of employment in later maturity and old age and criminality in women.

Maurice T. Price at the University of Illinois is studying the feasibility of democracy in China and is working on a criticism of Howard Becker's analysis of Chinese thought.

Stuart A. Queen is now acting librarian at Washington University.

Mary Schauffler remains associate professor of Sociology at Western Reserve University in Cleveland, 6, Ohio.

FALL ISSUE

Social Questions Bulletin

The Methodist Federation for Social Action, an unofficial membership organization, seeks to leaven within the Church, the sense of social obligation and opportunity, to study, from the Christian point of view, social problems and their solutions, and to promote social action in the spirit of Jesus. The Federation seeks for the complete abolition of war. The Federation rejects the method of the struggle for profit as the economic base for society and seeks to replace it with social-economic planning to develop a society without class or group discriminations and privileges. In seeking these objectives the Federation does not commit its members to any specific program, but remains an inspirational and educational agency, proposing social changes by democratic decision, not by violence.

Volume 43 OCTOBER, 1953 Number 7

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETS

Acts for Peace and Organizational Progress

Under the chairmanship of the new president, Rev. Dr. Loyd F. Worley, the executive committee of the Methodist Federation for Social Action met on September 29 at the University of Denver in Colorado with representatives from the East and West Coasts and from the Midwest in attendance.

NEW NATIONAL OFFICE ESTABLISHED

The committee voted to designate the new national headquarters address as the address of the Membership secretary: Box 327, Gresham, Oregon. This is also the new office of publication address for Social Questions Bulletin.

NEW OFFICERS CONFIRMED

The committee confirmed the election by the membership (through mail ballot) of the officers nominated by the 1953 Membership meeting: President, Rev. Dr. Loyd F. Worley, 573 Farmington Avenue, Hartford, Conn.; Vice-Presidents, Bishop J. W. E. Bowen, Atlanta, Ga.; Rev. Clarence T. R. Nelson, Dayton, Ohio; Rev. Edward L. Peet, Sacramento, Calif., and Mary Phillips, Lemont, Ill.; Recording Secretary, Rev. Lee H. Ball, Irvington, N. Y.; Assistant Recording Secretary, Miss Janice M. Roberts, New York City; Membership Secretary, Rev. Mark Chamberlin, Box 327, Gresham, Ore.; Field Secretaries, Rev. I. DeQuincy Newman, Sumter, S. C., and Dr. Willard Uphaus, 66 Edgewood Avenue, New Haven, Conn.; Editorial Secretary (Editor of Social Questions Bulletin), Rev. Jack R. McMichael, Upper Lake, Calif.

TREASURER SELECTED

In accord with the decision of the Membership meeting that a West Coast treasurer should be found for M.F.S.A. to work with the Membership secretary and new national office, the Executive committee elected Rev. Edward L. Peet of Sacramento, Calif., to that position. Rev. Hillis Culver of North Sacramento was selected as assistant treasurer. MEMBERSHIP DUES AND CONTRIBUTIONS FOR M.F.S.A. ARE URGENTLY NEEDED NOW, AND SHOULD BE SENT BY YOU DIRECTLY TO THE MEMBERSHIP SECRETARY AT THE NEW NATIONAL OFFICE, BOX 327, GRESHAM, OREGON. He and his national office staff will record, credit and receipt all contributions and then transmit them to the treasurer for deposit and for expenditure by check on budgeted items.

ANTI-WAR AMENDMENT ADOPTED

The Executive Committee confirmed adoption by the membership (through mail ballot) of an amendment to the M.F.S.A. Constitution proposed by the 1953 Membership meeting, and adding to the constitution this sentence: "The Federation stands for the complete abolition of war." By decision of the Membership meeting, this sentence has also been added to the masthead of the Bulletin.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM DEFENDED

The committee voted M.F.S.A. backing for both past and future efforts in defense of clergymen under fire for exercising religious conscience and democratic, constitutional rights.

APPEAL TO BISHOPS VOTED

In the interest of religious freedom and fair play for all clergymen, as well as for any bishop under fire and being unfairly and unjustly defamed and misrepresented by congressional committee press releases, an appeal was voted to the Bishops of the Methodist Church. They were asked to consider appointing a committee to study M.F.S.A.'s official attitudes and position, both now and across the decades, and to report the record to the church and to the public. In that spirit, the committee appeal expressed (as had been done before at General Conference) M.F.S.A.'s readiness for any fair investigation from proper church authorities, and it expressed confidence that the record would not show "any deviation from the spirit of prophetic religion as expressed in the Holy Scripture." Full text of this M.F.S.A. Appeal to the Bishops is found below.

PEACE STAND TAKEN

The Executive Committee adopted a resolution which calls on our government leaders to heed the strong and growing demands here and around the world for top-level negotiations in search for an end to the costly and doom-threatening cold war and arms race. Full text of the resolution appears below.

NAME UNCHANGED

The Membership meeting had agreed to submit to the membership a mail ballot on the question as to whether to change the name of the organization from Methodist Federation for Social Action to Methodist Fellowship for Social Action. The membership was polled on that question, but the Executive committee decided that, since that poll's results were indecisive, there should be a moratorium on the question at least until the next Executive Committee meeting (now scheduled for December 9 or 10 in Chicago). Meanwhile, your vote and views on the name question are welcome and encouraged.

MEMBERSHIP DRIVE PUSHED

Using the present opportunity to enlist new members for M.F.S.A. was stressed by the Executive Committee meeting. Every member is urged to become an M.F.S.A. evangelist and enlist at least one new member now. Here is a real answer to attempts to curb and intimidate! And if you are interested in helping develop a local action M.F.S.A. chapter in your city, write our membership secretary, who is stressing that project (Rev. Mark Chamberlin, M.F.S.A. National Office, Box 327, Gresham, Oregon).

MEMORIAL MEETING FOR BISHOPS BROOKS AND McCONNELL

Following the all-day Executive Committee meeting on September 29, M.F.S.A. sponsored a public meeting that evening in tribute to Bishop Robert N. Brooks and Bishop Francis J.

FRANCIS J. McCONNELL

by BISHOP F. GERALD ENSLEY

I wonder what Francis J. McConnell has thought—if he has been taking notice of them in the Great Beyond!—about the eulogies penned in his honor since his leaving us on August 18? Surely they must sound different from some of the communications he received in the steel strike days or during the more recent hysteria years! Probably the bishop's reaction would be—modest man that he was—that the tributes, like the report of Mark Twain's death, were "greatly exaggerated."

Those who knew Bishop McConnell need no reminder that a great man has gone, a magnificent mind, as amazing in its range and depth and humor as in its cutting edge; a tender sympathy that went out instinctively to the underman; a courage which had not the fear of man in it; a moral mysticism which found its driving power in the sense of the approval of the Christ-like God. He combined in himself excellences any one of which would distinguish: authorship of about 30 volumes of theology and social criticism, holder of some of the most highly sought lectureships, named by his colleagues of the ministry as one of the "Twenty-five Great Preachers of America," past-president of the Federal Council of Churches, and head of causes innumerable for social betterment, and for almost a third of a century a bishop of the Methodist Church. He was big in every dimension; truly, we shall not soon see his like again.

Bishop McConnell has been the acknowledged leader of social liberalism in the Methodist Church in our generation. Probably his greatest claim to historical remembrance will be his connection with the Steel Strike Report in the early twenties, one of the first telling blows for the humanization of industry. Possibly his most lasting contribution, however, will be his interpretation of the prophetic function.

For it was the bishop's deepest conviction that society stagnates unless there be men and organizations who take the moral for their domain and hold up with courage and persistency the intrinsic worth of human life against all opposition, until by its very rightness it wins affirmative response in spite of its deniers. We may almost say that Bishop McConnell's life is an essay in the definition of the nature of such social prophecy. The truth he tried to utter with both his lips and his long and noble life is that it is the sovereign business of the prophet to get the great moral values stated in human terms and enforced upon the common consciousness. He always contended that we must not confuse the prophet with the reformer. The prophet is an outrider in the caravan of human progress. He may spy out the land, but we must look to other men to go over and possess it. Nor can we expect the prophet to work in legislatures or council chambers, where half-a-loaf satisfies when the whole is out of the question. The prophet's function is to get moral questions up and not to let them down until they are settled, and settled right. The brave words of William Lloyd Garrison are in the prohpetic mood, "I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—and I will be heard."

While the prophet is an absolutist, he need not be a fool. No man, even his bitterest enemies, ever caught Bishop McConnell off base on matters of fact, moral judgment, or propriety. Indeed, in his Beecher Lectures on The Prophetic Ministry, the bishop warns against the self-styled prophet who is needlessly unconventional, taking pride in the outer shows of separateness, wildness, and craziness for its own sake.

We have speculated as to what Francis J. McConnell may be thinking. If we may judge from the man we knew, his thought would not be on himself or how men regarded him. His concern is directed to the persons and causes that he loved, to the Federation which he led and to whose helm he returned in waning strength and from well-deserved retirement when it was assailed in recent days. Now that he is gone, will his old friends allow themselves to be cowed and driven underground by reactionaries who want to identify the Methodist Church with soft-headed evangelism or the economics of William McKinley? Or will the liberals bring discredit on themselves by irresponsible utterance, asinine behavior, and that queer partisanship which wields a prophet's scourge on the iniquities of the right but reserves almost a priestly tenderness for the parallel sins of the left? Or, will the voice of true prophecy be heard again in the land, summoning men without fear to serve freedom, justice, and human welfare, and invoking without favor the judgment of a righteous God on offenses against these values, from whatever quarter they come? The tribute that Bishop McConnell would like to have is yet to be penned. It will be written by liberals who show by their conduct in the years ahead that they have learned the meaning of his life.

IS SOCIAL REFORM COMMUNISM?

By W. W. REID

"Social reform is one of the fundamental strengths of democracy," said the New York Times in a recent editorial on committees and individuals that equate the demand for social reform with communism.

"The (House Un-American Activities) committee could make no greater gift to the Communist than to assume that ministers who are militant fighters for social reform are ipso facto party-liners," added the Times. "Judging from some of the names released in recent testimony, it appears that the committee has already fallen into this terrible error."

Many ministers and many thousands of laymen in America are eager for social reform—working for better government, housing, laboring and living conditions, or for temperance and prohibition, or for economic adjustment in business or industry, or for tolerance, or for medical benefits, and many other "causes".

These men are "liberals," "progressives," "social reformers"; they are "to the left" (of most of us) socially, politically, or economically. They are likely to be critical of the present order of things, of the status quo, of entrenched power. If they are ministers, they are the few prophets among a greater body of priests. They are prophets because the Book calls them to urge men and nations to repentance. But to say that they are Communists or subversives merely because they are reformers is to do violence to logic, to fact, and to history.

It is now quite clear that too many equate social reform with communism. And clergymen who abhor communism are branded with its name because they would change some existing conditions. Two of America's most noted liberal rabbis, Doctors Wise and Magnes, were recently so branded; both are dead, but thousands of all faiths have come to their defense. Former Methodist Federation for Social Action executives, long at the forefront in social reform, have also been so accused.

"I am not and never was a communist," insisted the Rev. Jack McMichael to the House committee.

"I never have been a communist sympathizer or a communist party member; I can give place and date of my opposition to communism," writes the Rev. Charles C. Webber.

"I am not and never have been a member of any political party," Prof. Harry F. Ward told the press. "My judgment and actions concerning political and economic issues are derived from the basic ethical principles of the religion of Jesus, of which I am a minister and teacher."

I know these men well—and I believe them implicitly. They may be farther "to the left" than I am. But I know they and many hundreds more are religious prophets, working along legal and peaceful lines for Christian-based reforms. They are not, I am certain, seeking or conspiring "to overthrow this (or any other) government by means of violence."

M.F.S.A. APPEAL TO THE BISHOPS

Religious leaders who have been known to stand for social justice, world peace and basic human rights and freedom have again become the subject of misrepresentation and attack. Magazine articles and speeches of politicians have not displayed the characteristic of fair play. Releases from the House committee on un-American Activities have been given publicity without opportunity for defense. Even the action of the General Conference of 1952, concerning our fellowship, was not based upon a thorough investigation of all of the facts. With the evil spirit of suspicion let loose in the world, no religious leader, no matter how distinguished, is safe from misrepresentation and abuse.

The members of our fellowship joined with many others in repelling the unwarranted attack upon Bishop Oxnam. He was given the opportunity to face his accusers with facts. The same privilege should be accorded every minister and member of our church who is accused. Especially this should be granted as support for those named by the release recently made in the name of the House Committee on un-American Activities. The good name of our beloved church will be affected if any minister or member is really guilty as charged. But our shame will be increased if he does not have the support necessary for a fair trial.

We re-affirm our confidence in the integrity and the loyalty of those of our number who have been subjected to defamation and abuse without a hearing. We call attention to the following official statements of our organization which bear upon the tense issues of our day.

"The Federation does not commit its members to any specific program, but remains an inspirational and educational agency proposing social changes by democratic decision, not by violence." (MFSA Constitution.)

"The Federation rejects all forms of totalitarianism; affirms that no present social order is fully Christian; subscribes to no 'ism' but to Christianity; respects the ethical reality of the church, but recognizes its inherently conservative nature, and so affirms that its own radical witness must be expressed as an unofficial body within the church." (Statement of governing principles adopted 1949.)

Therefore, we respectfully request the bishops of the Methodist church to consider the appointment of a committee to give proper study of our official attitudes and position and to report the same to the church and to the public. We are willing to undergo any fair investigation and we welcome it from proper church authorities. We are confident that the record will not reveal any subversion or deviation from the spirit of prophetic religion as expressed in the Holy Scripture.

(The above statement authorized by the Executive committee of the MFSA meeting, September 29, 1953.)

ON THE DEFENSE FUND

Much gratitude is due the Federation members who so generously sent funds in defense of religious freedom and of ministers under attack from the House Committee for having exercised that freedom on behalf of peace, democratic progress, and human welfare. If you have not made a contribution and would like to, send your contribution for any needed legal and educational defense to Rev. Lee H. Ball, Defense Fund Treasurer, 24 Willow Street, Irvington, N. Y.

HOUSE COMMITTEE RELEASE ANSWERED

The Committee on Un-American Activities released to the press on September 11th the testimony of four professional informers, to the effect that 600 Protestant clergymen in this country are secret members of the Communist party, and 3000 or 4000 more are fellow-travelers. The name of your minister was included among the names of several distinguished religious leaders given to the press.

I am not, and never have been, openly or secretly, a member of the Communist party. I do not consider myself a fellow-traveler. I do believe in preaching and applying the ethical principles of Jesus, as set forth in the Bible. In the course of the years, I have signed many statements, made a good many speeches, supported many causes, on the side of peace, of civil rights, of defense of the rights of minorities. My motive has been to try to help people, individuals or groups, who were in need of assistance, wherever I could. I have done these things because I felt I should do them, to keep my conscience Christian. I am not ashamed of anything I have signed or said or supported.

There are two or three things about these attacks upon the clergy that we should get well in mind.

The first is that while we hear a good deal today about subversive influences, nobody bothers to define what "subversive" is. So it turns out to be anything that Senator McCarthy or Senator Jenner or Congressman Velde or the attorney general dislikes or disapproves. Sinister forces in American life build up the Communist danger to serve their own ends. I cannot believe that these investigation committees are seriously concerned about Communism in American churches. But what they are attacking, under the anti-Communist smoke screen, is the Protestant social gospel—our right to do something about our religion. And our Christian social gospel we must defend. The only excuse for an investigating committee is to get material from which to frame a law. But the first amendment to the constitution states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The real purpose of these investigations is to intimidate preachers, so they will say and do nothing about peace or about civil rights. If I know the preachers, they are not going to be intimidated. We take our moral directives from God, not from some congressman in Washington. Under cover of anti-Communism, we are getting thought control and fascism in America. The real issue is religious freedom. No committee of the congress has the right to decide what is orthodox in religion, or to compel religious conformity.

Consider, second, that when something, usually without any preliminary hearing, has been declared "subversive," then anyone who in any way has associated with it is also called "subversive." At the last count, 254 American organizations were on the attorney general's "subversive" list. This is the new doctrine of guilty-by-association, and it is un-American.

Third, "subversive" guilt is made retroactive, to go back 20 or 30 years to smear something you did or said then with the new implications that have been added today. This, too, is strange and un-American procedure.

With these devices—loose, reckless, undefined, blanket charges of "subversion," guilt-by-association, and retroactive, post facto guilt—almost anyone who has ever stood for anything can be persecuted, and his reputation and career ruined.

I am not a stranger among you. Some of you have known me for a good many years. I hope you have confidence in me as an American and as a Christian. Some day this present hysteria will be only an evil memory. American sanity and courage are beginning to reassert themselves. Whatever happens meanwhile, we can see it through, if as minister and people we present a solid front, and if we rely upon God's help. We are not alone. Thousands of Protestants, prominent and humble, clergy and laity, are already aroused to this danger to our religious freedom, and they are resolved that this drive toward the control of American thought and religion must be stopped. May God help us here to stand together, and we can win, and be then the stronger for it.

REV. LEE H. BALL.

They Call For Peace

Continuing to defend his advocacy of big power informal negotiations aimed at relaxing international tensions and ending the war threat and arms race, Prime Minister Churchill told the House of Commons on November 3:

"The only really sure guide to the actions of mighty nations and powerful governments is a correct estimate of what are, and what they consider to be, their own interests.

"Applying that test, I feel a sense of reassurance. Studying our own strength and that of Europe, under the massive American shield, I do not find it unreasonable or dangerous to conclude that internal prosperity, rather than external conquest, is not only the deep desire of the Russian peoples but also the long interest of their rulers."

Churchill's latest statement followed announcement that the Soviet Union had successfully developed and tested not only atomic, but also hydrogen weapons and bombs—an announcement which underscores the insanity and irresponsibility of rejecting measures which might bring peace.

Meanwhile the Pope had held that negotiation or "frank and honest discussion" among the big powers was "a first and indispensable condition of peace."

Nehru of India strongly agreed with Churchill that there should be a big power conference "to meet informally, in privacy and without a rigid agenda . . . to make every effort to rid humanity of the fear of war."

In the United Nations, many voices were raised on behalf of such big power negotiations. India's delegate, Krishna Menon, voiced that plea, and held that big power tension was "the factor which supervenes every discussion, on which all problems center, and the solution of which is essential if we are to see daylight at all in the affairs of mankind."

A leading American businessman, Ernest T. Weir, chairman of the National Steel Corporation, urged serious peace negotiations with the Soviet Union "in a spirit of give and take" as necessary to prevent disaster. He made this plea in a pamphlet, Notes on the Foreign Situation Based on a Trip Abroad, which he will send free on request to him at 2800 Grant Building, Pittsburgh 19, Pennsylvania. Mr. Weir defended his position in a letter to the New York Times on September 8:

"My actual position is this: Europeans believe Russia is now seriously disposed toward establishing a condition of world peace. This is a position which the Western nations should explore, and the way to explore is through negotiations . . . continued as long as they serve a constructive purpose . . . If Russia should prove to be sincere, the world would have much to gain. (Otherwise) the world certainly would be no worse off . . .

"It seems to me entirely wrong to continue to prejudge the Russian attitude . . . If the U. S. and other western nations were to take the position . . . that there should be no negotiations because 'Russia cannot be trusted,' the world would be condemned to perpetual stalemate which could only be broken by war . . ."

Mr. Walter Lippmann, covering the Anglo-U. S.-French talks in London, stated (Oct. 20) that "two great developments in the general situation" had been neglected: "We have all outgrown the notion that a conference with the Communist powers is a privilege that they are seeking and that we may or may not be willing to grant them." And secondly, for "the Europeans" it is "no longer . . . debatable . . . that for them the only defense against atomic warfare is to prevent it altogether."

In the same day's issue of the New York Times (Oct. 20), Defense Secretary Chas. Wilson was quoted as having told his press conference: "Today, the U. S., with superiority in atomic weapons, could assault the Soviet Union from its ring of bases around the Russian empire." He added that U. S. citizens "could get considerable comfort if they would imagine how they would feel if they lived in the Soviet Union—lived there with knowledge of this country's superiority in atomic weapons and possession of the ring of bases around Russia from which these weapons could be employed."

Does Mr. Wilson imagine that we live in the days of Hiroshima and Nagasaki when only one nation possessed atomic bombs, and when there could be a one-way atomic war? What possible comfort can there be for half-way sane Americans in the prospect of an atomic war in which we would not only deliver, but also receive atomic (and hydrogen) bombs? We who would live by atom bombs might well perish by them. Has an arms race, or a policy of intimidation, ever brought peace? Would it not be wise, before disaster comes, to turn from intimidation to negotiation, from arms race to multilateral disarmament, from hate and fear to love and the Golden Rule, from the death-promising principles of Mars to the life-promising principles of Jesus?

SUPREME COURT TO REVIEW HOUSE COMMITTEE

On October 12, the Supreme Court agreed to review the case of Julius Emspak, officer of the United Electrical Workers Union, who had been convicted for refusing (by appeal to both the fifth and the first amendments to the constitution) to answer questions he considered improper and unconstitutional from the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The court specifically agreed to rule on the question as to whether the House Resolution 5 setting up the committee as a permanent or standing committee, violated the constitution by abridging free speech, press, and assembly.

The brief submitted to the court in appealing for the review it voted, stated:

"The court cannot ignore the fact that the obtaining of information for legislative purposes, the power in aid of which the (House) Resolution (5) was passed, has become a hollow pretext for the compilation of a vast political index purgatorius, the systematic destruction of political dissent and the subjection of thousands of citizens not merely to ruthless invasions of privacy but to serious sanctions without due process of law. Congressional committees now sit in judgment over the political liberty of the American people—teachers, writers, trade unionists, editors, preachers, doctors and just ordinary Americans. We have reached the stage where a 'clearance' from the committee is often indispensable to one's livelihood, career and good name. The assertion by congress of these powers to sit in political judgment must be reviewed by this court. Unless these powers are curbed and constitutionally related to the legislative process, there is a serious danger of irreparable injury to our constitutional form of government.

"The current hue and cry concerning Communism has converted the activities of congressional committees into a vast game of hare and hounds. The only valid justification for these activities has been left far behind as the congressional subpena mill grinds out its paper trail of pursuit. As new committees join in the chase and compete with one another, new abuses are perpetrated and ever new 'sensational revelations' are promised to divert attention from these abuses. This process has now reached the point where the same individuals have been victimized over and over again and where to the invasions of the rights of the individual have been added serious attacks upon the principle of separation of powers."

McConnell, former presidents of M.F.S.A., who both died this summer. The meeting was held in the Iliff School of Theology chapel, and addresses of tribute were given by Iliff President, Harold Carr, Rev. Lee H. Ball, Rev. Jack R. McMichael, Rev. Clarence T. R. Nelson, Rev. Edward L. Peet and Rev. Dr. Loyd F. Worley.

M.F.S.A. APPEAL FOR PEACE

With the realization that both hydrogen and atomic weapons are in the hands of both of the world's major powers, it has become clear that the arms race has reached an impasse and that, not security, but death and destruction are the end results of our continuing along that path. The futility of war and the urgency of following the Prince of Peace, who blessed the peacemakers as children of God, was never more clear.

On behalf of the Methodist Federation for Social Action, we its officers and members of its Executive Committee, appeal to the leaders of our government and especially to President Eisenhower, to recognize the grave urgency of an effort through high level negotiation to ease world tensions in the cold war and arms race, and give the nations of the world an opportunity to use and develop their resources in the valiant and age-long struggle against poverty and preventable disease, in keeping with the demands of Jesus that the hungry be fed, the naked clothed and the shelterless be provided with shelter.

We urge President Eisenhower to accept the suggestions and pleas coming from the government of India, from Prime Minister Churchill of Great Britain, and from such leaders as Mr. Stevenson and ex-President Truman and from many others, to enter into immediate negotiations with the leaders of the other major powers, including Premier Malenkov, towards easing the grave international tensions.

Social Questions Bulletin

The Methodist Federation for Social Action, an unofficial membership organization, seeks to deepen within the Church, the sense of social obligation and opportunity to study, from the Christian point of view, social problems and their solutions and to promote social action in the spirit of Jesus. The Federation stands for the complete abolition of war. The Federation rejects the method of the struggle for profit as the economic base for society and seeks to replace it with social-economic planning to develop a society without class or group discriminations and privileges. In seeking these objectives the Federation does not commit its members to any specific program, but remains an inspirational and educational agency, proposing social changes by democratic decision, not by violence.

HAS ECONOMIC DOWNTURN BEGUN?

A year ago (Nov. 18, 1952), Elliott V. Bell, Editor and Publisher of Business Week, addressed the Economic Club of New York and said, "Most business men think a recession is due in 1953 or 1954." Though denying this would be disastrous, Mr. Bell predicted "a major business setback" during the life of "the new Republican administration," and listed as signs of the ending of "the biggest boom in history" the following: "tightening money rates, narrowing profit margins, an imminent oversupply of new homes, the approaching peak of armament spending, world-wide weakness in commodity prices and increasing difficulties in foreign trade."

PRODUCTION TOTAL DECLINES

One sign that the widely expected economic decline may have now begun, is found in the latest report of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. This points to the first actual quarterly drop in four years in gross national product or total production of goods and services. Though small ($1.4 billion on a yearly basis), this production drop is yet significant if it begins a new trend. The drop was explained by a decline in government war spending and in business spending for inventory accumulation.

END OF EMPLOYMENT RISE

In its "New England Letter" of Sept. 30, the First National Bank of Boston said: "Following a long rise, total non-agricultural employment has leveled off since the first of the year." Government figures show a 60,000 drop in manufacturing workers between mid-August and mid-September, and about the same drop in job-holders between September and October. Though the government figures indicate employment remains high and unemployment low, the Wall Street Journal of October 12 reported its own nationwide labor survey showing the "situation may be turning" and "increasing evidence of scattered layoffs." The Journal reported such layoffs in Detroit, Dallas. St. Louis, New Jersey, New York state, Washington state, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Wisconsin, in G. E. plants and in the auto, steel, rubber, locomotive and aircraft industries in the localities affected.

The U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics pointed to the "more than seasonable curtailment of output" to explain the greater drop in factory hiring this summer than in any summer since the war.

WORK WEEK AND OVERTIME DOWN

The Commerce Department reported that for the first time overtime work this October was less than a year ago. In its September 30 Newsletter, the First National Bank of Boston had stressed the importance of this factor: "More significant is the gradual decline in man hours worked. Any slackening in business will cut down on work schedules, and the work load will be spread to reduce unemployment. It is reported that most overtime pay is being used to buy durable goods on the installment basis. In consequence, when this extra compensation is not forthcoming, consumers will be forced to lower their living standards, and this will mean a decreased demand for goods all along the line."

At the end of October, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the average weekly wage of factory workers had fallen by $1.20 between mid-August and mid-September.

DROP IN BUSINESS SPENDING EXPECTED

One sign of decline is the expectation of a drop in business spending for new plant and equipment. The Commerce Department in its Survey of Current Business of September, reported:

> Between the third and fourth quarter (this year), the major industry groups are anticipating either a leveling off or a decline in their rates of capital spending. After allowance is made for seasonal factors, a 5 per cent decrease is indicated in manufacturing, primarily in the durable goods sector. Somewhat larger relative declines are expected by the public utilities and railroads. Other transportation, mining and commercial companies expect little change in fixed investment rate in the final quarter.

The National Industrial Conference Board, an employer agency, surveyed 159 manufacturing companies and reported on September 22 that over three times as many companies "plan to reduce their 1954 capital expenditures below the 1953 rates as expected to increase them."

DECLINE IN MANUFACTURERS' NEW ORDERS

In its Survey of Current Business for October, the Department of Commerce reported such orders declined "substantially" in July and August from the high second quarter level, mostly in the durable goods industries and largely due to cancellation of orders for military hard goods.

The same Survey for September showed the situation to be especially bad in some industries, such as the railroad equipment industry. There 6,900 new freight cars are being delivered a month, 8 per cent less than in the first quarter, but still over four times more than new orders which "in the past three months have averaged less than 1,600 units per month."

DECLINE IN STEEL INDUSTRY INDICATED

The Boston First National Bank's "New England Letter" of September 30 reported:

> Steel mills have been operating below capacity since June. Demand is spottier and shortages are fading. Cancellations of orders, although of small volume, are increasing. In consequence of easing demand, scrap prices have weakened. Competition is keen. Price cuts have been made . . . a buyers' market is well under way in the steel industry.

The same bank letter had reported on August 31: "The peak in demand for steel products has apparently passed. Sales of conversion steel products have dropped sharply. Supply is rapidly catching up with demand. The trade expects a slackening in mill operations in the fourth quarter."

As for the decline in price of scrap steel, this is as much as 24 per cent in the Chicago market since early August, and a Chicago broker told the Wall Street Journal (Sept. 21): "If scrap is a barometer of future trends of steel production, it is telling us that a storm of some proportions is in the offing."

DROP IN NEW HOUSING

There has been a steady drop in private "housing starts" since last February to the lowest point in nearly two years. Public housing has also declined, and sharply, from 47,300 in 1952 to 29,700 this year. Congress did not help when it slashed the public low-rent housing program, despite campaign promises, reducing to 20,000 the units for this year, after over 55,000 had already been contracted for. At the same time, Congress wrote off 125,000 more units, for which there were preliminary loan contracts.

The New York Herald Tribune of September 18 shows the importance of all this for our economy by pointing out that new housing is "considered an important economic indicator not only because housing forms an important segment of the construction part of the economy, but because new housing forms such an important market for the home furnishings and appliance industries."

As for construction in general, the Bank "New England Letter" of September 30 already quoted, stated: "A decline of construction expenditures for the fourth quarter is expected."

AUTO INDUSTRY SLOWS DOWN

On autos, the same bank letter reported, "Indications are that output will level off . . . large stocks and sluggish sales of used cars have had a dampening influence on the disposal of new cars in retail channels. Competition in the trade is intensely keen, with dealers' profit margins narrowing."

RETAIL TRADE OFF

The Commerce Department reports retail sales were down at the end of this summer compared to a year ago, and there has been a continued drop for the past three months, amounting to 3 per cent in department store sales for the four-week period to October 17.

THE SHAKY STOCK MARKET

Since last January, stock prices have fallen over 10 per cent as a whole. Explained Business Week on September 12, many who play the market, "think our present prosperity may be ephemeral. They have been scrambling to as safe a spot as possible before and if the blowoff comes." And U. S. News and World Report stated on September 18: "Looking ahead to 1954, many investors find cause for concern . . . Some decline in demand and production is indicated . . . The jolt may be painful for a good many people and businesses."

THE FARMER'S DEEPENING PLIGHT

The economic position of the farmer has steadily declined since 1946, and the Associated Press reported on October 30: "The price of farm products have been on the downgrade for more than two years." That day the Agriculture Department reported farm prices had continued their long decline between mid-September and mid-October, by 2.34 per cent. Thus farm prices had declined to a level "11.5 per cent below a year ago and 20 per cent under the record high." But prices paid by farmers had dropped only "one-third of one per cent from a month ago, 3 per cent below a year ago, and about 4.8 per cent below the record high."

In consequence, the farmer's parity level was at the lowest level in over 12 years. In mid-October farm prices were down to 91 per cent of parity, compared to 92 per cent a month earlier, 100 per cent a year earlier, and 122 per cent in October, 1946. Thus, the parity level of farm prices has dropped by one-third from the 1946 high!

Despite increased production, net income for the farmer has gone down. Thus, in 1952, crop production was up 3.5 per cent, but prices paid farmers went down by 11 per cent; so they suffered a net income drop of 3 per cent or $500 million. And the drop in farmer net income in 1953 has been much greater. Figures in the Federal Reserve Bulletin for September show farm net income in the second quarter of this year to have dropped 17 per cent below that of 1952 on an annual basis, and about 20 per cent below that of the same quarter in 1952.

BUT LIVING COSTS REACH ALL-TIME HIGH

Low prices to farmers did not mean low prices for consumers. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported October 28 that, "The average American paid more for his basic living needs last month than ever before in history," the fourth consecutive month in which a new record high in living costs had been reached, and the seventh consecutive month in which living costs had risen, reaching a level 13.2 per cent above that of June, 1950, prior to the Korean war.

THE PROFITS ARE HIGH

Despite the slash in prices paid farmers, food prices also have remained high for the consumer. As put by the U. S. News and World Report, August 21:

> As the years have passed, the housewife has paid more and more for the same amount of groceries, yet the farmer's share has become smaller. Today the housewife pays $1,017 for the food that cost $767 in 1946. That's an increase of $250 in her grocery bill. The farmer, however, gets only $49 of that increase. His share of the food dollar has gone from 52c to 44c.

To show how low farm prices don't guarantee low consumer prices, consider that orange prices paid the farmer went down by 40 per cent between August, 1952, ($1.06 a box) and August, 1953, (66c a box); while for the consumer in that year canned orange juice prices rose 33 per cent and frozen orange juice by 20 per cent!

With low prices to farmers and high prices from consumers profits of the big food corporations in between have been tremendous. The National City Bank in New York reported in its Monthly Letter in August that 28 leading food processing corporations in the first half of 1953 had increased their net profits after taxes by 21 per cent over the same profitable period in 1952. As for other large processors of farm products, 11 tobacco companies had raised their profits by 21 per cent and 24 textile and apparel companies by 34 per cent. Profit figures were high this year for the big grocery chains, the big meat packers, the big food packaging corporations, the big dairy giants (Borden net profits after taxes for the first half of 1953 were 20 per cent higher than in the same period of 1952), and the big bakers. For example, Ward Baking Co. showed 21 per cent higher net profits after taxes in the 27-week period up to last July 4 over the corresponding profitable period of 1952. Yet with its profts high and with wheat prices to the farmer low, the same baking company raised its bread prices by one cent a loaf in the New York area in September!

These high profits to big corporations processing and distributing farm products, help explain (as put in C.I.O. Leaflet No. 227) why the farmer in 1952 got only 13.5c for a 23c quart of milk, 31c for the cotton in a $3.50 shirt, 3.6c from a 23c can of corn, 3.3c for tobacco in a cigarette package, and 3.2c for wheat in a 16-17c loaf of bread.

And corporation profits in general have been high this year. The Security and Exchange Commission reported on October 25 that such profits were in the second quarter of this year the "best since 1951, both before and after taxes." And in 1951, corporation profits before taxes were the highest in U. S. history.

When Mr. Charles Wilson left chairmanship of the General Motors Corporation to accept appointment as secretary of defense, he told a congressional committee that he had always considered that what was good for General Motors was good for the country as a whole. If so, the country is in good shape; for General Motors reported on October 28 that it had sold more in the preceding nine months "than the corporation (the world's largest) ever sold before in any full calendar year. Both sales and earnings for the nine months were the highest reported thus far by any U. S. corporation." The corporation revealed that in that period it had made profits after taxes of $453 million!

Farmers and housewives might not agree that conditions for the U. S. as a whole were as rosy as those corporation profit figures suggest!

A PROBLEM AND CHALLENGE

High prices and profits on one hand combined with low income for farmers and other disadvantaged groups on the other to accentuate an old problem in our ecenomy which might contribute towards recession: the failure of mass purchasing power or consuming capacity to keep up with productive capacity. In one industry after another, there is now emerging the old problem of "excess capacity."

War was Hitler's "answer" to the overproduction (or underconsumption) in his economy, with the resulting unemployment and economic collapse. But his "answer" proved to be disaster. War and war preparation have helped obscure the problem in our economy since the Great Depression. But the problem remains and is coming to light again.

What will churchmen say and do in these crucial months to see that our answer is more rational, more humane, more democratic, more Christian—that it is an answer which puts people above both mammon and mars?

Churchmen Speak Out For Freedom

Highly significant statements have come in recent weeks from official Protestant sources, bearing creatively and pointedly on current attacks on democratic liberties and religious freedom at the hands of congressional committees and others.

We print below excerpts from recent statements from the General Council of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. and from the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

THE PRESBYTERIANS SPEAK

. . . The citizens of this country and those in particular who are Protestant Christians, have reason to take a grave view of the situation which is beng created by the almost exclusive concentration of American minds upon the problem of the threat of communism.

Under the plea that the structure of American society is in imminent peril of being shattered by a satanic conspiracy, dangerous developments are taking place today in our national life. Favored by an atmosphere of intense disquiet and suspicion, a subtle but potent assault upon basic human rights is now in progress. Some Congressional inquiries have revealed a distinct tendency to become inquisitions. These inquisitions, which find their historic pattern in medieval Spain and in the tribunals of modern totalitarian states, begin to constitute a threat to freedom of thought in this country.

Treason and dissent are being confused. The shrine of conscience and private judgment, which God alone has a right to enter, is being invaded. Un-American attitudes toward ideas and books are becoming current. Attacks are being made upon citizens of integrity and social passion which are utterly alien to our democratic tradition. They are particularly alien to the Protestant religious tradition which has been a main source of the freedoms which the people of the United States enjoy.

There is something still more serious. A great many people within and without our Government, approach the problem of communism in a purely negative way. Communism, which is at bottom a secular religious faith of great vitality, is thus beng dealt with as an exclusively police problem.

As a result of this there is growing up over against communism a fanatical negativism. Totally devoid of a constructive program of action, this negativism is in danger of leading the American mind into a spiritual vacuum. Our national house, cleansed of one demon, would invite by its very emptiness, the entrance of seven others. In the case of a national crisis this emptiness could, in the high-sounding name of security, be occupied with ease by a fascist tyranny.

Whatever concerns man and his welfare is a concern of the church and its ministers. Religion has to do with life in its wholeness. While being patriotically loyal to the country within whose bounds it lives and works, the church does not derive its authority from the nation but from Jesus Christ. Its supreme and ultimate allegiance is to Christ, its sole Head, and to His Kingdom, and not to any nation or race, to any class or culture. It is, therefore, under obligation to consider the life of man in the light of God's purpose in Christ for the world.

While it is not the role of the Christian church to present blueprints for the organization of society and the conduct of Government, the church owes it to its own members and to men in general, to draw attention to violations of those spiritual bases of human relationship which have been established by God. It has the obligation also to proclaim those principles, and to instill that spirit, which are essential for social health, or sound and stable policies in the affairs of state.

Loyalty to truth is the common basis of true religion and true culture. Despite the lofty idealism of many of our national leaders, truth is being subtly and silently dethroned by prominent public figures from the position it has occupied hitherto in our American tradition. The state of strife known as "cold war," in which our own and other nations, as well as groups within nations, are now engaged, is producing startling phenomena and sinister personalities.

In this form of warfare falsehood is frequently preferred to fact if it can be shown to have greater propaganda value. In the interests of propaganda, truth is deliberately distorted or remains unspoken. The demagogue, who lives by propaganda, is coming into his own on a national scale. According to the new philosophy, if what it true "gives aid and comfort" to our enemies, it must be suppressed. Truth is thus a captive in the land of the free. At the same time, and for the same reason, great words like "love," "peace," "justice," and "mercy," and the ideas which underlie them, are becoming suspect. People will become accustomed to going through life with no regard for rules or sanctities.

A painful illustration of this development is that men and women should be publicly condemned upon the uncorroborated word of former communists. Many of these witnesses have done no more, as we know, than transfer their allegiance from one authoritarian system to another. Nothing is easier for people, as contemporary history has shown, than to make the transition from one totalitarianism to another, carrying their basic attitudes along with them.

As a matter of fact, the lands that have suffered most from communism, or that are most menaced by it today, Russia and Italy, for example, are lands which have been traditionally authoritarian in their political or their religious life. And yet the ex-Communists to whose word Congressional committees apparently give unqualified credence are in very many instances people whose basic philosophy authorizes them now, as in the past, to believe that a lie in a good cause is thoroughly justified.

Let us frankly recognize that many of the revolutionary forces of our time are in great part the judgment of God upon human selfishness and complacency, and upon man's forgetfulness of man. That does not make these forces right; it does, however, compel us to consider how their driving power can be channeled into forms of creative thought and work. History, moreover, makes it abundantly clear that wherever a religion, a political system or a social order, does not interest itself in the common people, violent revolt eventually takes place.

In human conflicts there can be no substitute for negotiation. Direct personal conference has been God's way with man from the beginning. "Come, now, and let us reason together," was the word of God to Israel through the prophet Isaiah. We must take the risk, and even the initiative, of seeking face-to-face encounter with our enemies. We should meet them officially, whatever their ignominious record, and regardless of the suffering they may have caused us. We, too, have reasons for penitence and stand in need of forgiveness.

In any case, talk, unhurried talk, talk which does not rule out in advance the possibility of success, talk which takes place in private, and not before reporters or microphones or television, is the only kind of approach which can lead to sanity and fruitful understanding. Let the process of conference be private, but let its conclusions, its complete conclusions, be made public.

AND THE EPISCOPAL BISHOPS SAY

The church is equally opposed to what may be described as creeping fascism. We know from our brethren of the churches abroad that often fascism has come upon them unawares.

We are against trial by uninformed public opinion, against accusations by hearsay.

We are for fairness, and justice, as a part both of Christianity and of our democratic way of life.—Nov. 13, 1953.

Truman Defends Religious Freedom

(In his recent City College address, former President Truman strongly defended religious freedom.)

This wave of hysteria over communism has now reached the point where several legislators are undertaking to investigate the beliefs and opinions of clergymen. This is even more dangerous than the attack on education.

I notice that these attacks have been leveled at some of the leaders of our great Protestant denominations and some of the leaders of our great Jewish congregations—even against those who are dead and unable to defend or explain their actions.

Now, we surely all know that our Protestant churches and our Jewish synagogues are among the strongest supporters of American principles and ideals. I do not believe there is any distinction between any of our great religious groups in this country with respect to their adherence to the principles of our form of government. I think it will be a sad day for religious tolerance in this country when anyone starts to draw lines between our great churches in this matter.

We have a very great principle in this country and it is written into the Constitution that the Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

If Congress can make no laws prohibiting freedom of worship, it is certainly not entitled to investigate the beliefs of church groups or their leaders.

Of course, if a clergyman is engaged in espionage or has violated the law in any way, he is subject to the law like any other citizen. But matters of belief and opinion present a very different question.

If a clergyman is an atheist, he is at odds with the vows he has taken, with the body of believers whom he serves and with the God he professes. If such clergymen exist, their betrayal of religion is a matter for churches to handle. Only the churches can decide whether a clergyman has been faithful to his vows of ordination or not.

This is certainly not something for the secular power, the power of the state, to decide. These are matters of conscience, and the Congress of the United States and its committees are not competent to judge them.

The leaders of our churches from time to time throughout our history have taken stands on social issues. They have done this in response to the dictates of conscience, wherever the moral law has appeared to them to be involved. Many of them condemned slavery when it existed in this country. Many have condemned sweat shops, child labor and the forcible denial of collective bargaining. We have lived to see these condemnations become the law of the land. We have moved forward along the road of moral progress under the spur of our great moral leaders in the churches.

Of course, there are always differences of opinion in the churches themselves about how far church leaders should go in matters of this kind. Our churches have conservative wings and liberal wings. Some clergymen have been blind to social evils and others have been misled or deceived as a result of their zeal for social justice.

The Government and all its branches should stay out of church affairs.

Neither Congress nor the executive branch nor the courts should take it upon themselves to decide who should preach what in the pulpits. The churches and synagogues will take care of these matters themselves. I think they will come out with better answers than most of our human institutions.

But if our central government does not distinguish between the real dangers of communism and the hysterical fear of it, if our national leaders do not stand firm against panics, and against the invasion of individual freedoms, then we are in for some bad times.

SEN. DOUGLAS ASKS NEW RULES FOR CONGRESSIONAL PROBES

(From a recent speech on the Senate floor.)

"For these committees are in fact fast becoming legislative courts. At present the committees are in effect given a wide hunting license and allowed to cruise at large without any restraint as to rules of evidence, procedures, questioning, or the making of public statements. The degree of fairness or lack of fairness which is followed therefore largely depends upon the members of the committees themselves and more particularly upon their chairmen. All too often, they in effect make their own rules and do anything that they wish . . .

"But justice is meant for all, for conservatives and liberals, reactionaries and radicals alike. It should not be confined to any one class or to members of any one party. It should apply to everyone. This is necessary for practical as well as ideal reasons. For if the group in power at one time is unfair to its opponents, it cannot properly ask for or expect better treatment when it is out of power and its political antagonists are in control. There is, therefore, great practical sense as well as high idealism in the Golden Rule that we 'should do unto others, as we would have them do unto us'.

"If those in power today do not observe the rules of fair play, they may suffer in the future from the same abuses.

"It is important, therefore, that we should take steps to improve and unify the procedures followed by these congressional committees.

"1—Witnesses reflecting adversely upon other persons should only be called to testify at a public hearing after they have been examined in executive session and their relative credibility established. In other words, unreliable witnesses should not be allowed to wreck reputations.

"2.—Testimony adversely affecting any persons should not be received in a public hearing unless it has first been heard in private and corroborated by other witnesses or by printed material.

"3.—Derogatory material not developed in public hearings, rumors, and other unsubstantiated reports or confidential data should not be issued to other private citizens or 'leaked' to the press by the members or staff of a committee. Star chamber proceedings are as bad in connection with a man's reputation as with his life.

"4.—If it seems probable that a person is likely to be adversely reflected upon in public testimony, he should be notified in advance of the probable nature of the charges, invited to be present at the hearing and permitted to make a brief but adequate statement at the conclusion of the adverse testimony.

"Alternatively he should be permitted to submit a written statement to be included in the record of the hearings. Time is of the essence in these matters, and a man is seriously damaged if the charge is published on page one on a given day but the denial or reply only comes days later and is then published on page 22. Mark Twain once remarked that 'a lie can go around the world before truth has time to put on its boots.' We should strive to let the reply as nearly as possible be simultaneous with the charge. Otherwise, we do the party adversely concerned a distinct injustice, and are guilty of letting the lie have time on its own wings to fly.

"5.—Persons charged with offenses or otherwise subjected to derogatory comment should have a limited right to cross-examine adverse witnesses and to produce witnesses on their behalf on the points under question.

"6.—Witnesses before the committee should have the right to be represented by counsel and if not in contempt of the committee, to make brief statements in their behalf and defense.

"7.—The general purpose of the hearing should be stated in advance and authorized by a majority of the committee so that the relative relevancy of the questions asked may be judged in this context. In other words, vague and unauthorized 'fishing parties' should not be indulged in.

"8.—No report should be filed or published which has not been submitted to the members of the committee and approved by a majority. The minority will of course retain its right to file a dissent."

SOCIALIZATION IN GREAT BRITAIN

(with comparison to Europe)

1. INTRODUCTION

Americans tend to harbor distorted views about economic planning because they live in a country which is at one pole on the question and are most concerned politically about a country which is at the other pole. However, neither free private enterprise nor complete state ownership are as popular in the rest of the world as is an intermediate course. Moderate socialization was the inter-war pattern in part of the British Commonwealth and Scandinavia, and is now spreading in the rest of Europe. France, Britain, Czechoslovakia and Poland, as the newest recruits, are exciting increasing American attention. The research staff decided to concentrate in this report on the British experiment because of the ready availability of information and the abundance of critical discussion within the framework of the experiment.

Our readers will recall the surprised headlines with which the American press announced in July 1945 that Winston Churchill's coalition government had been defeated by the British Labor Party in the first general Parliamentary election since before the war and that the new government was to be headed by socialist Clement Attlee and to be composed exclusively of laborites. Even after two years of the new regime, we are not quite sure what socialism means in the country of Oxford University and the Established Church and the Empire.

Although her new leaders are avowed socialists, socialization in a strict sense of the term represents but one aspect of a planned economy in which the important economic decisions are channelized toward providing full employment and ultimately a fairly-distributed high national income. The British socialist approach is summarized succinctly by David Lewis, head of the British Labor Party's Canadian counterpart, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in "Labor in the British Commonwealth," Antioch Review, Summer 1946:

> Socialization is for British Socialist movements strictly a tool for the achievement of social and humanitarian ends, but never an end in itself. Therefore, it follows that if certain necessary results can be better obtained without immediate socialization then socialization is postponed. And although the postponement may cause a few ripples, it is not likely to rock the boat. Similarly, the monarchial system ceases to be wrong in principle, but becomes merely a practical problem of the adaptability of the monarch to changing political and economic circumstances . . . When a British Labor spokesman says that he does not intend to liquidate the British Empire, he definitely does not mean the same thing as Churchill, but there is no doubt that he does express an intention to retain the associations for good which have developed within the Empire and Commonwealth simultaneously with the evil.

BIBLIOGRAPHY—GENERAL

Since the most rewarding current literature on the British experiment is designed for those who approach the subject with some background, we recommend that your reading start with a few historical and general materials. Of the books that are easily available here, the best introduction to Britain and the other socialized countries is Harry W. Laidler, Socio-Economic Movements, New York, Cromwell, 1944. The particularly pertinent chapters are 18, on "Fabianism" and 31, on "Labor and Socialism in Great Britain and Western Europe." For a brief summary of the history and the 1945 victory of the British Labour Party, also see the Rand School pamphlets, What Do You Know About British Labor, by David Shub and Robert Alexander and Labour's First Year—The Facts. An excellent summary of the electoral victory and the developments of the first year in power is presented by the Summer, 1946 issue of Antioch Review. It contains the David Lewis article already mentioned; Margaret Cole, "How Labor Came to Power"; Grahame Miller, "The Economic Policy of British Labor"; P. C. Gordon Walker, "British Foreign Policy"; and Keith Hutchison, "Britain and the United States: Cooperation for World Trade." A similar but less successful introduction is the 10-page section on "British Labor in Power" by Jack Winecour and Michael Young in the October 7, 1946 issue of New Republic. The 1945 pre-election material is in the Report of the 44th Annual Conference of the Labour Party (the 1945 pre-election Conference).

The best popular sources on the Labor Party are its own publications, which include a weekly Bulletin, and the best theoretical sources are the pamphlets and Fabian Quarterly of that society and the publications of Victor Gollancz, Ltd. The British addresses are: Labor Party, Transport House, Smith Square, London SW 1, Fabian Bookshop, 11 Dartmouth St., London SW 1; and Victor Gollancz Ltd., 14 Henrietta St., Convent Garden, London WC 1. Extremely valuable to Americans are British Speeches of the Day (bi-monthly) and the monthly Labor and Industry in Britain, both available free at the British Information Service, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York City 20, which also handles the Monthly Digest of Statistics and other publications of His Majesty's Stationary Office.

The new government has placed a tremendous emphasis upon its domestic economic program, upon which there is an abundance of worthwhile reading, mostly of British origin. The January-February issue of British Speeches reprints the speeches of the Ministers introducing the bills on transport nationalization, town and country planning and agriculture. The December issue of Labor and Industry, which is a review number has two good general articles that will be referred to again, "Nationalization Measure" and "Pattern of British Reconstruction." We also recommend to the researcher the Manchester Guardian and the Daily Herald, the latter being the organ of the government.

The best known publication left of the government is the weekly New Statesman and Nation which expresses the sentiments of the "back bench" of the Labor Party. The most worthwhile publication to the right is the weekly Economist with excellent informative articles that express the Liberal criticisms. For checking up the progress of legislation in Parliament, an invaluable source is the daily resume of its activities in The Times which also carries good articles. This amazing newspaper is run by a national trust supposed to insure impartiality. The Standard British monthlies are Fortnightly and Contemporary Review, both generally pro-government. For Conservative Party criticism of the government, the most easily available sources are the weekly Statist and Spectator. Miscellaneous British publications that often contain materials useful in this project are The Round Table, quarterly journal concerned chiefly with the commonwealths; Economica, quarterly organ of the famous London School of Economics and Political Science; Political Quarterly, edited by a board composed of Harold Laski, G. D. H. Cole, H. L. Beales, Richard Crossman and Kingsley Martin; Labour Monthly, organ of the British Communist Party, and the New Leader, organ of the Independent Labour Party. The various publications mentioned in this pararaph are usually available in well-equipped American libraries.

In addition, there are two periodicals of non-British origin that are extremely valuable sources for socialization in the various countries, including Great Britain. They are the International Labour Review of the International Labour Organization, and the American Business Week, which has a section on "Business Abroad." Fortune occasionally carries articles on British economic problems, but they are generally quite unsatisfactory.

Going to the more generalized American publications, we found in the December, 1946 issue of the University of Chicago's Journal of Political Economy one of the very best extensive articles on the British economy. Mary E. Murphy, "British Labor Party and Domestic Reform." See also R. P. Schwartz, "Labour's Economic Policy," Fortnightly, September, 1946. Instead of listing here the many sources on the specific parts of the program, they will be found in the appropriate sections of the text.

2. HISTORY OF THE LABOR PARTY

Summarizing British Labor Party history from the sources cited above, we get a picture of a party that is pre-eminently practical, although with rich theoretical overtones. Organized in 1900 as the Labor Representation Committee by a conference of union delegates and socialist societies, the Labour Party has been winning Parliamentary seats since 1902 and using its present name since 1906. It first became distinctly socialist in the campaign at the end of the first World War when it adopted the present constitution and an electoral program advocating nationalization of the mines, railways and electric power, broad social legislation, and economic planning. Laborite representation jumped in the election from 38 to 59.

By 1929 Ramsay MacDonald was able to form a Labor Government which was supported by 288 Members of Parliament, only 20 short of a majority. Although elected on a platform which added to the earlier demands nationalization of the Bank of England, the land and life insurance, the minority status of the party confined its legislation to such reformist measures as public works and unemployment insurance. In 1931 came what is still referred to as MacDonald's great betrayal. The Party had instructed him to resign on an important issue, only to see him accept back his position as Prime Minister in a National Government. This caused considerable disturbance within the party and a tremendous drop in its prestige without. The following election reduced Labor to 52 seats, but even then it received a popular vote of 6 million against 2 million for the Liberals and 11 for the Conservatives.

The present leadership dates from the expulsion of MacDonald and his supporters. By 1935, the last election before the second World War, the Party staged a comeback to 154 seats and 8 million votes, becoming the official Opposition. With a new emphasis upon socialism, the Party Conference two years later adopted "Labor's Immediate Program" which advocated nationalization of finance, land, transport, coal and power. The laborites presented in Parliament a resolution that legislative effort be directed "toward the substitution of an industrial and social order based upon public ownership and democratic control of the instruments of production and distribution," which lost by only 153-117.

The wartime Coalition Government, instituted by Winston Churchill in 1940 which could not have stood without Labor Party support, gave the new group of labor leaders the opportunity to become experienced government administrators. Clement Attlee, who became Deputy Prime Minister, was a University-educated intellectual with the background of Member of Parliament since 1922 and party leader since 1935. Ernest Bevin, the new Minister of Labor and National Defense, had been head of the powerful Transport and General Workers' Union. To the Ministry of Supply went Herbert Morrison, qualified by long experience in the administration of London County. Dr. Hugh Dalton, who became Minister of Economic Warfare, and later President of the Board of Trade, was a leading socialist intellectual. These men all made excellent reputations in fulfilling their official responsibilities and also succeeded in pushing through much social legislation, including a wages and hours law. Although theirs was an electoral truce, laborites not in the Cabinet maintained a sort of opposition in Commons where their most prominent spokesman was Aneurin Bevin, now Minister of Health.

The coalition broke up after V-E Day when Labor asked for a fall election and Churchill thought to defeat them by setting it for July. The Party Conference adopted a vigorous platform entitled "Let us Face the Future," which declared:

> "The Labor Party is a Socialist Party, and proud of it. Its ultimate purpose at home is the establishment of the Socialist Commonwealth of Great Britain—free, democratic, efficient, progressive, public-spirited, its material resources organized in the service of the British people. . . . But Socialism cannot come overnight, as the product of a weekend revolution."

First on its agenda for action the party placed the provision for full employment which demanded planning and investment control, and after that came nationalization.

Labor won 396 out of the 640 seats in Commons, and the new government was formed by Attlee. The core of his administration is composed of Chancellor of the Exchequer Dalton, Foreign Minister Bevin, and Lord President of the Council Morrison. Other key figures are Sir Stafford Cripps as President of the Board of Trade, George Isaacs as Minister of Labor and National Service, and Emanuel Shinwell as Minister of Fuel and Power. Isaacs is a former Chairman of the General Council of the Trades Union Congress and Shinwell was a junior minister in previous Labor governments.

Backing these men is no idle group of intellectuals, but a powerful organization which depends for its electoral work on local clubs and for its strength on trade union affiliates which control some 2,200,000 votes. Other affiliates are the Royal Arsenal Co-op Society with 26,000 members and five socialist societies. The largest and best-known is the Fabian Society of 2700 members, which since 1883 has been the center of British intellectual socialists. Its members have included Sidney and Beatrice Webb, H. G. Wells, George Bernard Shaw, and G. D. H. and Margaret Cole. All of these groups are represented at the Annual Conference, which is the Party's highest organ, according to their numerical strength. The Conference writes the platform and elects the national officers and National Executive Committee. For the latter, the union delegates choose 12 members, the labor parties choose 7, and the entire delegation selects 5 women and one representative from the socialist and cooperative groups. Although in the past the trade unions have sometimes dominated the party by the weight of numbers, in 1945 only 231 of the candidates were union members. Prospective candidates for public office on the Labor Party ticket are required to be individual members of the Party, to belong to a trade union if eligible, and to pledge loyalty to the platform, with the reservation that any member having scruples about the party's position may abstain from voting. Candidates are proposed by local groups and endorsed by the National Executive Committee well ahead of the elections, quite the opposite from American procedures.

3. NATIONALIZATION

A. Introduction

Americans may imagine that when Labor suddenly became the government in the midst of a very trying situation, it was forced to hurriedly formulate emergency plans of action, but this is quite contrary to fact. In developing their theories, Labor economists and political planners have always acted on the assumption that they would be called upon to put their theories to the test, and Dalton, Shinwell and Morrison had worked on their respective schemes for a period of years. The 1945 platform was not a statement of political dogma or a set of vague promises, but a program for government action in light of 1945 political developments and economic conditions.

The nationalization program, which has received the fullest publicity, derives from the fourth point in the election platform, which reads, "the fuel and power industries, inland transport facilities, and the iron and steel fields must be publicly owned." In presenting the draft platform to the Party Conference, Herbert Morrison had said,

> ". . . we will argue out the case for socialization industry by industry on the merits of each case. We will take a body of industries in our first period of full Parliamentary power and socialize those that require to be socialized first on the basis of suitability and urgency . . . We have selected them partly because they are key industries, largely at the service of other industries, and therefore the efficiency of other industries depends very largely on those industries and services. We cannot tolerate key industries and financial institutions being muddles on the one hand or being built into anti-social totalitarian monopolies on the other."

B. Coal

The labor government tackled the coal industry in its first major industrial nationalization. The conditions which led to the dramatic fuel and power crisis in February 1947 had been apparent for years, and were the chief factor in giving coal nationalization its high priority. Government figures indicate that the number of miners fell from 1,107,000 in 1913 to 782,000 in 1938, and that output in tons per manshift fell from 1.17 tons in 1935 to 1.00 ten years later. The chairman of a royal commission on coal was advocating nationalization as the only remedy back in 1919, and the government actually did exercise considerable control from then on through the war years, when the newly-created Minister of Fuel and Power operated the mines.

The Coal Industry Nationalization Act of 1945 transferred on January 1, 1947 ownership of all British coal mines and auxiliary industries to a public corporation, the National Coal Board, in return for compensation interest-bearing stock. This public corporation form, like our TVA, is the favorite method of British public ownership. The Board is chaired by a non-socialist leading figure in wartime coal control. The other members are a well known civil servant, a mining engineer, a leading physicist, an accountant experienced in mining work, a man experienced in the domestic and foreign marketing of coal, the former secretary of the mineworkers' union, and Lord Walter Citrine, until now the well-known Secretary of the Trades Union Congress. Although appointed by the Minister of Fuel and Power, and subject to his direction on policy, the full-time board of experts will make their own managerial decisions. The industry's critical need for new capital for modernization was solved by authorizing the Minister to advance the Board $600 million in the next five years. However, the board will function as an independent financial unit and will make payments to the government toward the interest on the compensation stock and on the new capital loan.

There is some left-wing criticism of the government that this is nationalization, but not socialization. Beder differentiates fascist and socialist nationalization in that in the latter not only are the physical means of production possessed by the state but these means must be used for the good of the whole society. In this sense the Labor Government has inaugurated socialist nationalization. However, the old socialist demand of direct participation by the workers in management is unsatisfied since the Labor Government appoints a board of experts. The coal nationalization act acknowledged the problem and authorized the board to work on a solution.

Cole predicted that workers' control would not be exercised through the union, which should remain a bargaining agent, but through special bodies such as pit committees and district and national councils. An early development in this field took place in November 1946 when the coal board called a preliminary meeting of what is to be the National Consultative Council. Composed of representatives of the National Union of Mineworkers, National Association of Colliery Managers, and National Federation of Colliery Deputies, the Council would consult with the Coal Board on those employment problems that go beyond terms and conditions of employment. The board will also be advised by two consumer councils, one for industrial and the other for domestic users.

Whereas the left-wing critics of the government are concerned with the manner of exercising control, the right-wing critics have given the most attention to the matter of compensation. Because of its technical nature, we quote the government's own explanation in "Nationalization Measure":

> "Compensation paid for the transfer of assets to the Board has been based on the amount they might have been expected to realize if sold in an open market by a willing seller to a willing buyer. A global sum of $669,000,000 was fixed by an Arbitration Tribunal on the formula of net maintainable revenue of the assets multiplied by a number of years' purchase (which has not been disclosed) and this sum will be distributed first between districts and then to individual collieries. Companies will be compensated in government stock except for a limited number of cash payments under special conditions, and though the stock will be inalienable in the first instance (to avoid adverse effect on the market) it is intended to provide the means for its gradual liquidation as needed by the recipients."

For source material we refer you back to "Nationalization Measures," Labour's First Year, and the Miller, Winecour and Murphy articles. Additional material on the technical matter of control came from G. D. H. Cole, "National Coal Board," Political Quarterly, October 1946, and "Meetings of Representatives of Employers' and Workers' Organizations in the British Coal Industry," International Labour Review, January-February 1947. For a general discussion on problems involved in the exercise of public ownership, see Ian Mikardo, "Ministers and their Boards," New Statesman and Nation, September 7, 1946. Historical and statistical material on the coal industry is contained in the July 1946 and March 1947 issues of Labor and Industry.

C. Civil Aviation and Cable and Wireless.

Nationalization of civil aviation was the first part of the general transport program to be effected. The Civil Aviation Act also utilizes public corporations, retaining government ownership of the British Overseas Airways Corporaton and setting up two more, the British European Airways and the British South American Airways. These corporations will normally follow regular business policy and have the additional power not possessed by the Coal Board of raising their own capital. In the initial period they may also be helped by the government. Residuary power of direction in the public interest is with the Minister of Civil Aviation, who appoints and is responsible for the Directors, and who will be aided by an Air Transport Advisory Committee. The government will compensate the private companies for physical assets and the municipalities for airports.

The two other nationalization measures of Labor's first Parliamentary session were concerned with the Bank of England, which will be discussed in connection with investment control, and cable and wireless. The latter involves not merely England but the commonwealths and was the outgrowth of a Commonwealth Telecommunication Conference in 1945 which recommended that all overseas telecommunication services be brought under the control of a board representing the commonwealth governments. Compensation is determined on the same basis as coal, but differs in that the government stock given to present owners is negotiable. The above measures are discussed in "Nationalization Measures" and the Miller and Murphy articles.

D. Transport

Of all the nationalization proposals, the one exciting the most opposition is the Transport Bill of Labor's second Parliamentary session. It is also the most extensive, providing for government acquisition on January 1, 1948 of all the railways, canals, railway coaches, and the undertakings of the London Passenger Transport Board, and for later acquisition of long-distance road haulage and passenger service. After that date, private truckers will not be able to obtain licenses to carry goods for hire more than 25 miles from base or to carry their own goods over 40 miles except for certain kinds of freight.

The Bill sets up a British Transport Commission to manage the newly acquired facilities and to coordinate all other trucking services, passenger road transport, and commercial harbor facilities. The Commission, appointed by and responsible to the Minister of Transport, will devote most of its energies to promoting an efficient and adequate system of inland transport, with the provision that they make the revenue meet all proper charges. Actual managerial control of the different concerns would be shared by five executives dealing respectively with railways, docks and inland waterways, road transport, London transport, and hotels.

On the method of compensation we quote from Baynard, cited below:

> "In satisfaction for existing rail and canal stock the Commission proposes to issue British Transport 2½% stock based upon the Market valuation operating within certain dates. The principal and interest of the stock will be guaranteed by the government. The market price chosen is that existing either 6 months before the last General Election or six days before the King's speech opening the present session of Parliament (in which the intention to nationalize transport was announced), whichever is the higher. For the road haulier's a two-part scheme of compensation is suggested: the replacement of the acquired assets at the time of the transfer, less depreciation on an agreed scale, and a payment based on from two to five times the net annual profit lost to the undertakings. For local authorities operating passenger transport services to be acquired under the Bill it is provided that the Commission assumes liability for the interest and sinking fund charges for any net debt which is outstanding at the time of transfer. No further payment is envisaged and this method of compensation is justified by the government on the ground that the assets are merely being transferred from one public authority to another."

The critical Economist argues that nationalization of transport is not essential, that compensation is too low (their general criticism of all the measures), and that the definition of long-distance trucking is too inclusive.

Our sources are Murphy and McClellan cited above; "The Transport Bill Dissected," Economist, December 7, 1946; "Nationalization on the Cheap," Economist, November 23, 1946; "The Future of Inland Transport," New Statesman and Nation, December 14, 1946; "Nationalization of Inland Transport," Labor and Industry, January 1947; and H. T. Baynard, "Nationalization of Transport," Fortnightly, February 1947.

E. Electricity

On the agenda of the second Parliamentary session is also the nationalization of electrical power, which is discussed in A. M. F. Palmer, "Public Ownership and Electricity," New Statesman and Nation, August 1, 1946; "The Electricity Bill," Economist, January 18, 1947; "Unanswered Electricity Questions," same publication, February 8, 1947; and "Electro-Robbery," Statist, January 18, 1947.

The first of these articles explains how the existing Central Electricity Board steers a course midway between private monopoly and government control, and the second goes into the proposed set-up. The Bill would put the generative functions of the industry, which include the power stations and the Grid under a Central Authority. The distributive system it would place in the hands of 14 independent Area Boards, each appointed by the Minister of Fuel and Power. The government is again prepared to make a substantial investment for new power stations and improvements in the distributive system, a substantial portion of which would be for rural electrification.

The article in the Statist, which is mainly concerned with compensation, says the holders of securities in other than holding companies will be compensated by British Electricity stock of a value equal to the average of mean quotations for the six trading days ending November 8, 1946, or, if higher, at the average of mean mid-monthly quotations for the 6 months ending July 1945 of the securities taken over. Holding company compensation will be subject to negotiations. The critics argue that this method does not allow for the profit-making opportunities which might have been expected in the post-war period.

F. Iron and Steel

Although iron and steel was the only other industry slated for nationalization in the 1945 platform, so far this has not been done. In May 1946 Commons resolved approval of the government's announced decision to nationalize part of the industry, involving the mining and quarrying of ore, the coke oven not included in coal nationalization, the manufacture of pig iron and steel ingots from pig iron and scrap, and the primary or heavy rolling sections of the industry. However, the appropriate legislation was not introduced into the second Parliamentary session, and instead the government bent its energies toward establishing a Control Board. By stipulating that the Board would not be concerned with nationalization, the industry was persuaded to participate in a body composed of two representatives each from industry, labor, and government. Their prime function would be to supervise current development and insure adequate attention to modernization. The Board would also advise on general price policy and administer, under the direction of the Minister of Supply, the remaining wartime controls over the production, distribution, and import of iron and steel products.

The British steel industry is in much better shape than coal or cotton, but many of the plants are still extremely inefficient in comparison to their American counterparts. The industry is closely organized into an Iron and Steel Federation which had itself planned a large reorganization scheme to be financed in part by its own resources and in part by recourse to the capital market. Apparently the government's plan is to itself furnish part of the capital and for the Control Board to take the place of private industrial supervision of the reorganization. This would put the industry in a special category of its own midway between nationalized and non-nationalized industry. There is some speculation that the government will acquire shares in the industry, as a step toward nationalization. We have seen no material to indicate the outcome of the plans. However, at the date of writing radio commentators are predicting outright nationalization in the next Parliamentary session.

For more material on the various stages of iron and steel planning, see "Iron and Steel Nationalization," Labor and Industry, July 1946; "Second Thoughts on Steel," Economist, August 24, 1946; "British Steel Plans Reorganization," Labor and Industry, November 1946; and the Murphy and Schwartz articles cited above.

4. PLANNING

The government's other industrial economic measures stem not from its ideas on socialization so much as its insistence that planning is an important requisite of a healthy economy. The 1945 platform placed it even before nationalization, saying: "Planned investment in essential industries and on houses, schools, hospitals, and civic centers should occupy a large field of capital expenditure with a national investment board determining social priorities and promoting better timing in private investment."

Herbert Morrison, to whom labor delegated the job of setting up and supervising the planning machinery, described it in October 1946 as the Steering Committee, representing the key economic ministries (Labor, Supply, Fuel and Power), together with the economic section of the cabinet secretariat, the Central Statistical Office, and his own office of the Lord President of the Council. The Committee gathers and assesses economic intelligence, prepares forecasts on farming, prepares economic plans, advises the Ministers thereon, and reviews the execution of the plans. Broadly speaking, the Steering Committee discovers the gaps between supply and demand, and the Ministers close them. It is assisted by Working Parties whose activities are explained by Morrison:

> "One estimates the total manpower available, and the forward distribution of manpower, on various assumptions. Another assesses the forward demand for expenditure in the investment field, and devises the means of holding back investment which is inessential or can be deferred, while ensuring that a reserve of non-urgent investment projects is built up for rapid execution—for example if the tendencies toward trade recession and unemployment should become significant in the world. Another Working Party watches import needs and methods of paying our way by visible and invisible exports. The material produced by the Working Parties is put together in trial balance sheets of man-power, national income and expenditure, and overseas payments and receipts."

There was criticism that the planning machinery was inadequate, and it has since been implemented, the chief addition being the tripartite Planning Board. Its full-time chairman is Sir Edwin Plowden, a director of British Aluminum Company and considered one of the bright young men in business. His initial staff consists of several personal assistants, and industrial consultant, and economists from the economic section of the cabinet and from the planning sections being established in each major department. Some of the personalities involved are Hilary Marquand, economic adviser to Clement Attlee who formerly taught at the University of Wisconsin, Robert Hall, head of the economic section of the cabinet and a socialist sympathizer, and E. Max Nicholson, permanent secretary in the Lord President's office and former chairman of Political and Economic Planning. Charged with developing a long term plan for the use of manpower and other resources, the board will work under Morrison, and all of the policy decisions will be made by the Ministers.

Besides announcing the current findings of its planners in the Monthly Digest of Labor Statistics, the government publicized its overall plans for 1947 in a February White Paper called "Economic Survey for 1947." The main goals in what is intended as a balanced series of objectives are rises in exports to 140% of the 1938 volume to pay for the greatly increased necessary imports, and rises in capital equipment other than homes to 155% of the normal pre-war year. Recognizing the importance of proper allocation of manpower and materials, the government announced a manpower budget together with plans to recruit the additional 200,000 workers required, allocation of large resources to industrial equipment and maintenance, and the availability to industry of foreign exchange for essential machinery.

The reader will find Herbert Morrison's "Planning in Britain," which appeared in Personnel Journal, January 1947 excellent—this is also available separately through the British Information Service—and "Britain's Brain Trust," Business Week, April 12, 1947. The leftist criticism of insufficient personnel and status for the planning machinery was voiced by Aylmer Vallance in "Plan for Planners," New Statesman and Nation, March 8 and 15, 1947. The conservative viewpoint that there is too much planning, resulting in a stultifying atmosphere, appears in John Chamberlain, "Britain Under Planning" Yale Review, December 1946. The Economic Survey is summarized in "Britain's Economic Budget—1947," Labor and Industry, March 1947.

5. CONTROLS OVER PRIVATE INDUSTRY

A. Voluntary

In the nationalized industries the government is comparatively free to carry out its plans, but in the rest of the economy the cooperation of private management is important. One very interesting aspect of the British experiment is the attempt to obtain voluntary cooperation and internal planning within the industry to fit it into the national picture. In the Fall of 1945 Sir Stafford Cripps announced for the 15 most important non-nationalized industries the appointment of tri-partite working parties composed of 4 representatives each from management, labor, and consumers, and an independent chairman. Their terms of reference were

> "To examine and inquire into the various schemes and suggestions put forward for improvements of organization, production and distribution methods and processes in the industries, and to report as to the steps to be taken in the national interest to strengthen the industry and render it more stable and more capable of meeting competition in the home and foreign markets."

The cotton textile industry, which after coal was in the worst shape during the inter-war period, suffering from inefficiency, from Indian and Japanese competition and from the development of synthetic fabrics, has received the most attention. Its Working Party's findings are embodied in a 278-page report presented in May 1946. The chief recommendation was that the industry be modernized and re-equipped at a cost of $53 millions, to be financed by a compulsary levy on the industry on a spindle and loom basis, the levy to be balanced by an increase in prices. It also proposed an equipment board to allocate expenditures, amalgamation of mills into more efficient units, a Cotton Council with tri-partite representation, a Central Marketing Company, and a state agency for buying raw cotton. The employers agreed with the other members on many parts of the report, but dissented on the proposals for compulsary amalgamation and compulsary levy as destructive to individual initiative. The government objected to both increased cotton prices and compulsary amalgamation, and presented its own plan to the industry, which involved the government making a gift of 25% of the needed investment with the conditions that orders for machinery must be placed within 2 years, that the mills work 2 shifts, and that money will be available only to groups of mills containing 500,000 spindles, which means some amalgamation. At last reports, both industry and labor had accepted and were putting into operation this plan. The government has also introduced a bill establishing a Raw Cotton Commission with monopolistic rights in the buying and distributing of raw cotton.

Some of the other Working Parties are in Pottery, Hosiery, Furniture, Jewelry and Silverware, and Shoes. The latter Party recommended the establishment of a Shoe Manufacturing Board to be financed by industry and government grants and to represent the manufacturers, trade union, trade interests at both the raw materials and distributive ends, and research and design bodies. It will have power to collect statistics on, but not to control conditions of entry into the industries, supplies, or conditions of employment.

As successors to the Working Parties, which were temporary, the government has proposed permanent Development Councils. The Industrial Organization Bill introduced in January 1947 enables any one of 8 departments (Board of Trade, Agriculture and Fisheries, Supply, Works, the Admiralty, Fuel and Power, and the Scottish Office) to establish tri-partite Development Councils after consulting with any organization representing trade or workers' interests. The kind of activities which may be undertaken are chiefly investigations—into methods of production and new technical equipment, methods of training, design, new marketing techniques, etc. But the Councils are strictly limited in jurisdiction by what is specifically conferred by the Minister, and each individual council needs the approval of both Houses of Parliament. Their initial duration would be for 3 years.

Obviously, the matter of obtaining the cooperation of private industry is still in an experimental stage. The most interesting thing about it is that here all the proposals embody the socialist demand for a share in management by the workers.

The reports of the various Working Parties are published by His Majesty's Stationery Office. The subject is discussed in McClellan; G. M. A. Grube, "Home Front in Britain," Canadian Forum, June 1946; "Plan for Cotton Industry," Labor and Industry, January 1947; "State Monopoly for Cotton," Economist, November 30, 1946; "A Recipe for Hosiery," Economist, September 21, 1946; "The Furniture Report—a Summary," Economist, November 16, 1946; "Footwear Working Party's Report," Labor and Industry, October 1946. The Development Councils are explained in "Government and Industry," Economist, February 1, 1947.

B. Investment Controls and the Bank of England.

The government still has some wartime controls over industry, and they have been supplemented by others. The most important of these is its control over new investments, which are most significant in a country where new machinery and buildings must be procured as a necessary prelude to full-scale peacetime production. For supervising financing through the capital market, the government inherited and made permanent two war-time agencies, the Capital Issues Committee and the Public Works Loan Board, which latter canalizes all important municipal borrowing. The labor government implemented these by the establishment of the National Investment Council which had long been demanded by Laborite economists. Under the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act of July 1946, any industrial firm desiring to sell securities must first obtain permission from the Capital Issues Committee which administers the policies laid down by the Council. There is a system of priorities designed to prevent an inflationary scramble for fresh capital, and to insure that due weight is given to the needs of the reconversion and export drives.

The same legislation is also designed to sustain full employment when the present impetus is spent. If the demands of private industry for fresh capital fall below a desirable level the Treasury can stimulate such demand by guaranteeing loans to private companies up to $200 million annually, and if necessary this can be increased. The government has also planned against a slump period to stimulate the economy by expenditures of its own on roads, forestation, and other projects which are now being readied for instant development.

Closely allied to labor's electoral demand for planned investments was the third point on the 1945 platform which read: "the Bank of England must be brought under public ownership and the operation of other banks harmonized with industrial needs." This pledge was fulfilled by the Bank of England Act, which was labor's second big piece of legislation. Surprisingly enough, this measure received little opposition, and the former Governor of the Bank, Lord Catto, remained after nationalization. The Treasury exercises its new control over the Bank by its appointment of the 16 Directors and by policy direction. The importance of the Act to Labor's investment policy is that it compliments the government's control over capital financing by giving it control over short-term credit, which is usually obained chiefly through the banks. Because of the interrelations of the Banking system, ownership over this bank also gives the government control over the policies of the many private financial institutions.

The Bank of England Act is also important in the compensation pattern of the nationalization program. On the technical aspects of this we quote again from "Nationalization Measures":

> "This provided for us the transfer to the Treasury of the whole of the existing capital stock of the Bank of England and for the issue of Government stock yielding the same return to existing stockholders. The bank had £14,553,000 of stock outstanding and during the previous 20 years the average annual gross dividend had been 12%. As the stock was quoted on the Stock Exchange at about 400, the yield was about 3%. The government has therefore issued £400 of Government stock earning 3% for every £100 of former Bank of England stock. At any time after 20 years, the Treasury will have the option to redeem the new stock at par."

For further discussion on investment policies, we refer you to the McClellan, Murphy, Miller, and Winecour articles cited above, and to the official "Pattern of British Reconstruction" and "Nationalization Measures" also cited. On the Bank of England, more material will be found in R. F. Harrod, "Consequences of Nationalizing the Bank of England," Political Quarterly, July 1946; and K. R. Bopp, "Nationalization of the Bank of England and the Bank of France," Journal of Politics, August 1946. The investment legislation also includes an Exchange Control Bill which is discussed in "The Exchange Control Bill," Economist, November 16, 1946.

C. Controls over Industrial Sites.

A more novel control is that exercised over the location of new factories. Part of this control is connected with the program to re-invigorate the great depressed areas of Great Britain where had been concentrated the pre-war depression and where even today there is unemployment. The Distribution of Industry Act passed in the last months of the Coalition enables the government to acquire and clear derelict land and encourage the development of new industry in order to achieve a healthy economic balance instead of reliance upon one industry, which had been the pattern. This operates so that when National Cash Register wanted to establish a British location, its choice was limited to South Wales, Dundee, Clydeside, Cumberland, or Tyneside. Private industry objects that this forces them away from the centers of transportation, markets, and labor supply. The government answers that this is necessary in order to stop overcrowding in central England and to bring some measures of prosperity to the people in what are known as Development Areas.

Control over the location of industrial sites is also one aspect of the more extensive program which is sometimes referred to as nationalization of the land. Nationalization is really too broad a term to apply to the present legislation but it is used by Morrison and others to characterize their ultimate intentions. As Morrison said at the 1945 Party Conference, what the government needs for the present is the use of the land rather than immediate ownership over all of it, and that the measure provides.

Another vehicle for establishing this control is the extremely complex Town and Country Planning Bill of labor's second Parliamentary session. In introducing the legislation, Mr. Silkin, the Minister of Town and Country Planning, pointed out that such planning is especially important in a small, densely populated country where the demands on the lmited supply of land are heavy and often conflicting. The purpose of his legislation is to secure a proper balance between these demands so that the whole land is used in the best interests of all the people. Earlier ministries had recognized the need for some action to prevent the further diversion of agricultural lands to other uses and the further increase of slums, and had sponsored various planning acts. However, defects in machinery and powers had resulted in little being accomplished. The new Bill retains county councils as the primary planning machinery, but authorizes the creation of joint planning boards. Furthermore, it compels the local authorities to make extensive surveys and submit plans within 3 years.

The planners will allocate the use of all the land within their jurisdiction after considering the social, economic and geographical factors involved. Since the plans are intended as guides for long-term development, most of the allocating at present will be in broad terms, such as agriculture, housing, and industry, except for the areas in which development is expected within 10 years, in which case the plans will be very detailed. They will be given wide publicity in order to inform the present property-holders what they can expect and to encourage their participation. However, before the owner can undertake to develop his property or change its use even in conformity to the plans, he must obtain permission from the district councils or other agents of the Planning Minister. He may be refused and preference given to the town authorities if they desire to undertake the development themselves as part of a town plan. The Bill even encourages the authorities by giving them compulsary purchase powers at 1939 prices.

The most revolutionary part of the legislation is in the compensation provisions. If the government refuses to permit the owner to develop his land, it is under no compulsion to compensate him for depriving him of his development rights. As we understand it, the theory is that since most of the planning is for derelict areas, the land would have no development value if not for the government's efforts, and therefore compensating the owner would mean the government was paying for value which it had itself created. The net effect of this provision is to transfer most development rights in land to the state. However, the Bill does provide for compensation in hardship cases—those where there is a real and verifiable loss to the owner. Presumably this refers to land that had an obvious development value in 1947 apart from any plans. Furtermore, when the government does grant permission to change the use of property, it will levy a development charge on the increase in value which will result. This levy may be assessed on 100% of the increased value or at a lesser rate. In any case, it must be paid or secured before the owner can commence his project. As an alternative, the owner can ask the government to buy his land outright and then lease it to him at a charge covering its entire value. These provisions will be administered by a Central Land Board, in which the development rights will be vested.

Although this program seems strange in land-plenty America, there is pretty general agreement in Britain on its necessity. Even the usually critical Economist says,

> "If ever any Bill had a worthy and honorable purpose, this is it. The advantages of establishing effective control over all the forms of physical development so as to exorcise the sprawling suburb and the seaside shanty-town, so as to site factories near their workers and protect rich horticultural lands, so as to provide green belts and open spaces, and wide roads and spacious, uncrowded city centers—these advantages are well worth the getting, even at the cost of a new crop of controls."

The effect on private industry will be that the government controls the number and variety of new enterprises.

Americans may be interested in the controls it proposes over outdoor advertising—a scourge in Britain as in America.

The Distribution of Industry Act is discussed in "Pattern of British Reconstruction," and "Progress in Development Areas," Labor and Industry, February 1947. The Town and Country Planning Bill is reveiewed extensively in "The Planning Bill," Economist, January 11, 1947; Lewis Silkin, "Town and Country Planning," British Speeches, January-February 1947; "Town and Country Planning," New Statesman and Nation, January 18, 1947; and "Sapping the Land Bastille," same publication, January 11, 1947.

Closely associated with Town and Country Planning is the Agriculture Bill, one of whose provisions is that land which is farmed inefficiently by its present owners may be taken over and operated by the government. For further material on this, see "British Agriculture," Labor and Industry, February 1947; "The Agriculture Bill," Economist, December 28, 1946; and the Miller and Murphy articles cited above.

D. Miscellaneous controls.

The decisions of private management are also amendable to the plans of the government under other measures. Following the sixth point in the 1945 electoral program, that "suitable economic and price controls should be enacted in order that priorities can be provided for the most important items," Labor enacted the 1945 Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act. According to the Miller article, it retains the government's wartime powers to place restrictions on the manufacture of luxury consumer goods, to control raw material and retail prices, to place restrictions on the disposal and acquisition of certain raw materials, plants and industrial products.

6. SOCIAL SECURITY

The major portion of Labor's economic program is of a preventive nature, but the government recognizes that even if major social ills are avoided, there will still be individual ones to be cared for, and the tenth point of "Let us Face the Future" stated, "Legislation must be secured to extend social insurance over a wide field to include every individual." The new legislation impliments social security provisions which England has had for years, takes up all aspects of the famous Beveridge Report, but in many cases grants higher benefits and easier conditions.

The program is based on the National Insurance Act and the National Industrial Injuries Act administered by the new Minister of National Insurance and the National Health Service Act under the Minister of Health, both of them acting with the aid of advisory committees that include representatives of all interested parties. The first is financed by contributions from workers, employers and the state. It is compulsary for all employed persons with annual incomes over $416, voluntary for self-employed and non-employed persons, who pay proportionately more. All are insured against maternity, old-age and death, the self-employed are also insured against sickness, and the regularly employed are insured against all of these plus unemployment. These two acts started operating in the fall of 1946, along with family allowances of one shilling per week per child after the first.

The National Health Service Act gave the government to April 1948 to establish services whereby, according to Murphy: "every man, woman and child, from birth to death, will have medical services of all kinds, without the imposition of any fees. The buildings and equipment of all voluntary and public hospitals will be transferred to the Ministry of Health, with staffs becoming employees of regional boards." In effect, medicine will be nationalized, for "the sale of medical practises to individuals will be prohibited and the state will compensate doctors who desire to dispose of such practises to the government. A Medical Practises Committee will regulate the opening of new offices and the succession to old ones while country and borough councils will provide health centers and full health-visiting services in the home."

The best sources is "Social Security Legislation in Great Britain," International Labour Review, September-October 1946. Others are Murphy cited above; "Pattern of British Reconstruction"; "British Social Security," Labor and Industry, September 1946.

CONCLUSION

The time has not yet arrived to evaluate the effectiveness of Labor's program in providing full employment. The reader who is interested in making such an evaluation for himself would do well to keep up with the Monthly Digest of Statistics, issued by the Central statistical Office that is involved in the planning. The April 1947 issue gives some indication of progress that has been achieved so far. In January 1939 unemployment amounted to 1,270,000 as compared to 401,000 in January 1947. At the beginning of this year, there were 18,126,000 in industry, against 17,920,000 in the earlier year. As to the vital coal productivity—the number of wage earners rose from 692,000 in November 1946 to 703,000 in March 1947, and output index from 547 in August 1946 to 648 in March.

On the long-range problem, we recommend Philip S. Brown, "Prospective Income and Capital Formation in the United Kingdom," American Economic Review, September, 1946. He concludes that if full employment is maintained for 15-20 years, as is possible, industrial capabilities will expand by 50% but will still be outstripped by Russia and the United States. He has a very full bibliography on industrial conditions in Britain. Another and shorter summary of economic conditions is S. R. Dennison, "Hopeful Factors in the British Economy," Foreign Affairs, January 1947.

BRITISH EMPIRE

1. CANADA

Of the other socialist and labor parties, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation of Canada is probably most like the British Labor Party in philosophy and organization. So far the only place it has been put to the test of developing a practical program is the province of Saskatchewan, where the CCF has had power since June 1944. The socialization program there takes different forms than in Britain because of a different kind of economy. In a country where farming is the basis of life, the CCF is less interested in raising productivity of industry than it is in making the rest of the industrial system better serve the needs of the farmers.

Socialization of industry is proceding by two methods—the expropriation of old industries and the starting of new ones by the state. The procedure for expropriation is governed by The Department of Natural Resources and Industrial Development Act, 1944. Compensation is based on fair replacement value, deterioration and obsolescence, and damage to remaining property. If the owner and the appointed minister cannot agree as to amount, it is determined by an arbitrator named by the Attorney-General from the King's Bench. The masterstone of the program is the Crown Corporations Act, 1945. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council may, by order of the executive council, appropriate and take possession of any works used in the operation of any industrial or commercial enterprise where the taking is necessary for the operation of any business by a crown corporation constituted under the act.

In the utility field, the government has taken over the provincial lines of the Greyhound Bus Company and one of the principal power companies, in connection with which plans include expansion of rural electrification. In the industrial field, plants acquired or built by the government now include brick factory and ceramic works, woolen mill, box factory, shoe factory, tannery, printing plant. This will be expanded in the coming year to include a sodium sulphate plant and the manufacture of rock wool. In the insurance field, action was prompted by an investigation that showed fire losses were less than one-third of the premiums charged by the old companies. Here the government went into competition and issued all types of policies except life.

The government has also gone into two new types of enterprises, both of which are tremendous boons to the people involved. The Fur Marketing Service insures trappers a fair and reasonable cash return on their season's work. The government equipped a warehouse for the storage and grading of furs. Here are held regular auctions to which come representatives of the leading wholesalers in Canada and the States. The trapper or rancher receives the entire price less a 5% service charge. For the fisherman, the government built a storage locker and filleting plant at one of the principal lakes to permit year-round fishing and insure adequate prices. The fish are filleted, inspected, quick-frozen, packed in attractive waxed cartons, and stamped with the government label. The Natural Products Marketing Act, 1945 established the Saskatchewan Marketing Board for the purpose of providing for the promotion, control, and regulation of the transportation, packing, storage, and marketing of any product of agriculture, or of the forest, sea, lake, or river. Under it, there is also some control of the timber industry.

Over-all planning on public enterprises is done by an Economic Advisory Planning Board, which is now making an economic survey and 10-year plan of development. Economic machinery is also to include an Industrial Development Fund to create new industries. This projected program for expansion by no means excludes private enterprise, and such establishments are apparently to be aided with research and financial assistance. In fact, in the first 22 months of CCF government, private enterprise in the province increased to the extent of 167 provincial companies, 44 extra-provincial ones, and 641 partnerships.

What the CCF has been able to accomplish in the way of socialization in Saskatchewan is naturally limited by the powers of the provincial government. Its more extensive program for Canada as a whole is set out in the Regina Manifesto, which was adopted as the guiding principles of the party in 1933. Point 1 on planning is to be accomplished by a National Planning Commission consisting of economists, engineers, and statisticians. Point 2 calls for socialization of finance—banking, currency, credit, and insurance, to control currency, credit and prices. The machinery would include a Central Bank and a National Investment Board. Point 3 advocates socialization of transportation, communications, electric power, and all other industries and services essential to social planning, to be operated under the general direction of the Planning Commission. The platform also includes broad proposals for social security and hospitalization, such as have been carried out in Saskatchewan.

We found the most worthwhile publication to be the Canadian Forum. Morris C. Shumiatcher has written three useful articles for it, "Socialism and Social Welfare in Saskatchewan," in June 1945; "Saskatchewan Socialism Works," June 1946; and "Hospitals: Saskatchewan's New Public Utility," January 1947. We recommend also the Forum's "Action in Saskatchewan," in March 1947. See also L. H. Laing, "Socialists in Business," Canadian Business, September 1946; and "Highlights of New Forest Policy of Saskatchewan," Canadian Lumberman, February 1, 1947. The official organ of the provincial CCF is The Commonwealth. The best American articles are J. King Gordon's on "Action in Saskatchewan," appearing in the Nation August 17 and 24, 1946.

On the Canadian movement generally, the best American source available is the League for Industrial Democracy pamphlet, Canadian Progressives on the March, by M. J. Coldwell, published in 1944. A fairly good recent summary is W. E. Greening, "The Canadian Labour Movement," Contemporary Review, February 1947. The standard Canadian pamphlet is less satisfactory in "Canada. What Canadian Labour Wants," Round Table, March 1947.

2. NEW ZEALAND

The New Zealand Labor Party which has been in power since 1936 has been involved in fewer socialization projects than the Canadian or British, largely because a large measure of socialization has already been achieved there. In the sixties and seventies of the last century telegraph, railroads, and the construction of highways and bridges were taken over by the government. At the same time, the government opened a life insurance agency and a trust office. In the period from 1891 to 1912, the government purchased some coal mines and started the retail sale of coal, opened a state fire insurance office, and sponsored much social legislation.

The first of the new nationalization measures since 1936 was concerned with the Reserve Bank. The government already had controlled one-third of the stock and 4 of the 6 directorates as a result of earlier legislation. It now becomes purely a state enterprise, run by a board of directors appointed by the governor and subject in general to the policies of the Minister of Finance. Another measure transformed radio broadcasting which had been run by an independent board into a government department under the supervision of a cabinet member. An interesting sidelight here is that the government has also organized a commercial radio service to be financed by advertising and to cater to lower tastes than the government program. Government control over transportation was reinforced by the establishment of a National Airways Corporation whose members are appointed by the Minister of Air and directed by him. The corporation will be financed by the government and empowered to acquire compulsarily the equipment of private companies. The fourth nationalization measure vested in the state ownership of all uranium in its natural state. Experimental work in radioactive substances is subject to state control.

In the productive field, the linen and flax industry became subject to controls that probably amount to nationalization. The instrumentality of control is the Flax Corporation of 8 Directors, of which 2 are appointed by the government, 2 represent the linen and flax growers, 2 the manufacturers who use the processed fiber, and 2 the employees. According to Lipson, cited below, "the Corporation has the power to grow and harvest the flax or arrange for it to be grown, to purchase crops, and to establish and operate factories for processing them." The surpluses of the Corporation go to the government.

Other government economic activities include an extensive social security program, housing, and control of agricultural prices through government marketing of butter, eggs, cheese, fruits, etc., both domestically and overseas.

We are greatly indebted to Leslie Lipson for his article, "Democracy and Socialism in New Zeland," American Political Science Review, April 1947. Marc T. Greene has written two useful summaries of the New Zealand situation: "New Zealand Advances Under Labor Rule," United Nations World, February 1947; and "A Test of Socialism in New Zealand," Foreign Affairs, October 1946. On the November elections, which the Labor Party won by a slight majority, see "New Zealand. The General Elections," Round Table, March 1947 and "The New Zealand Elections," Economist, December 28, 1946. On the social security program, see "Amendment of the New Zealand Social Security Act," International Labor Review, March-April 1946. On the new labor legislation, see "New Factories Act in New Zealand," International Labour Review, November 1946. The May 1946 issue of the same has "Post-war Economic Stabilization in New Zealand."

3. AUSTRALIA

The Australian Labor Party has been in power since 1935. The constitution of the party states as its objective: "The Socialization of Industry, Production, Distribution and Exchange. This was elaborated in the platform to include banking and insurance, monopolies, shipping, public health, wireless transmission, sugar refining, and munitions." (See Ross, cited below.) However, it has apparently not undertaken any major industrial nationalization. As to banking—the Central Bank is largely a nationalized bank, in competition with trading banks for private banking business.

About the only satisfactory article of recent vintage is Lloyd Ross, "The Philosophy of the Australian Labor Party," Antioch Review, Spring 1947. He gives the historical background and then concludes that the party is lacking in socialist orientation. "Australia, After the Election," Round Table, March 1947 is mainly a discussion on wage-pegging and other anti-inflationary measures, not necessarily socialistic. A lengthy technical treatment of the Central Bank is given in J. S. G. Wilson, "Australia's Central Bank," Journal of Political Economy, February 1947.

4. AFRICA

The socialization process in the British Empire is even reaching into the colonies. We can illustrate this by the African colony, Nigeria. It has set up a public corporation to run the banana plantations that formerly belonged to Germans, and another to handle the distribution of electrical power. Pending public corporations in other parts of Africa would involve a hydroelectric plant in Central and Eastern Africa, the development of phosphate deposits in Uganda, and the extension of rice production in West Africa. The British government at home is also prepared to expend large sums to develop peanut plantations. Even more important, a recent White Paper recommended the compulsary acquisition of all mineral rights for the Crown, which would hereafter closely regulate mining, and eventually take it over. "Colonial Economics Changing," Business Week, January 18, 1947.

EUROPE

1. SCANDINAVIA

In Europe, the first nations usually thought of as socialized or semi-socialized are Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. The most striking recent developments we have heard about are taking place in Sweden. There, the prewar period had seen the nationalization of railways, electric power and other public utilities, a large government-owned lumber and pulp industry, and a big iron and steel works. The Social-Democrats took power in the August 1946 elections with promises to nationalize insurance, the importing of oil, gasoline and coal, and housing. Since then, they are also studying methods for nationalizing the shoe, sugar and armaments industries definitely, and any others that are monopolistic or run inefficiently. In the banking field, the present government inherited strong controls and is discussing implementing them by establishing a state bank.

In Sweden permanent bodies to effectuate cooperation between government and industries include an Investment Board for industrial building activity, a Commercial Policy Board for problems of trade policy, and the Industrial Production Board for locating new firms and eliminating frictional and seasonal unemployment.

The pre-war socialization programs of the Scandinavian countries are treated in many older works, including Laidler cited above. On recent developments, we relied chiefly on "Sweden and Nationalization," Economist, December 21, 1946. On similar developments in Norway, a promising article is J. R. Hight, "Norwegian Government Goes Into Steel Business," Iron Age, December 26, 1946.

2. FRANCE

The continental nationalization program that sounds most like Britain is France. The nationalization schedule started with some coal fields in December 1944 and continued with airways in June 1945, the Bank of France and the great deposit banks in December, certain insurance companies and gas and electricity in April 1946, and the rest of coal in May. Before the war, the state had controlled the railroads, and the telephone and telegraph system and exercised some control together with industry in the aircraft and aircraft engine plants. The latter are also fully nationalized now, together with the nation's largest automobile firm. During the period of nationalization, industrial production jumped from 18% of 1938 levels in August 1944 to 80-85% in the last part of 1946.

The French are apparently incorporating the principle of workers' control into the management of the nationalized enterprises. The Miners' Charter of February 1946 sets up local, regional and national committees to handle matters of discipline and conciliation, to fix the occupational grading coefficient, and to determine on wage increases for seniority, etc. In the power industry, there is a Superior National Staff Commission with 18 members to decide on staff questions. Nine represent the central services and are appointed by the Director General of Electricite de France and nine represent the staff, being appointed by the Minister. Of these, four represent the administrative and technical staff, three represent the wage earners, and two the salaried employees.

The National Planning aspect of the French economy is the new 4-year scheme known as the Monnet Plan, reported in November 1946 by the "National Council of the Plan for Modernization and Equipment of France" set up under de Gaulle in 1945. The central idea is that the nation should concentrate on modernization in order to overcome discrepancies in production such as that it takes a French worker five times as long as an American worker to produce a car. This contemplates strict government controls in coal, building materials, steel, transport, and agricultural machinery.

For an introduction to nationalization in continental Europe, we recommend Barbara Ward, "Europe Debates Nationalization," Foreign Affairs, October 1946. She reviews the conditions leading to the new economic program and summarizes most of them.

On nationalization, see "France Still on Middle Road," Business Week, November 23, 1946; "Nationalization of Banks and Industries in France," and C. Bettelheim, "Economic and Social Policy in France," International Labour Review, September-October 1946. On worker control, in addition to Bettelheim, see "Staff Regulations for Nationalized Industries and Public Services in France," International Labour Review, January-February 1947. The most comprehensive article on the new planning is "The Monnet Plan," Economist, December 14, 1946. For socialist interpretation, see Geleo and Andrea, "France's Four-Year Plan: Its Motive and Meaning," Modern Review, May 1947.

3. CZECHOSLOVAK REPUBLIC

In Czechoslovakia nationalization started even before liberation. As early as 1920 factory works councils had been given consultative powers in industry, and these councils took over the factories as they were abandoned by the Germans in retreat. The government in exile agreed during the war that enemy and abandoned property would be nationalized, and as soon as it returned it legalized the actions of the councils. Then in October 1945 Benes issued the four decrees that established broad nationalization, effecting about 65% of Czech industrial capacity. Broadly speaking, it affected all industries employing over 500 workers, and none with below 150. The extensive list and text of the decrees are given in Sharp, cited below.

The nationalized industries are formally constituted state enterprises, which have as their basic capital the net value of the property. Management is by a committee headed by a manager and including representatives elected by the employees and persons nominated by the Central Authority. The latter is selected by the government after consultation with trade unions and other organizations. Factory Works Councils, selected by secret ballot, are mandatory in all plants, whether nationalized or private. These councils do not themselves interfere with management, but serve with it on joint boards.

By far the most useful source is Samuel L. Sharp, Nationalization of Key Industries in Eastern Europe, Foundation for Foreign Affairs, Washington, D. C., 1946. Beside providing much of the information above, Sharp devotes space to the motives and conditions surrounding Czech nationalization. The other articles, all very good, are Karel Buzek, "Czechoslovakia in Transition," Canadian Forum, June and July 1946; "The Czech Compromise," Business Week, March 8, 1947; W. N. Hadsel, "Czechoslovakia's Road to Socialism," Foreign Policy Reports, February 15, 1947; and "Nationalization and the Czech Two-Year Plan," Economist, January 4, 1947.

4. POLAND

The basic nationalization law was promulgated in January 1946. The state takes over without compensation the economic enterprises of former German and Danzig owners and with compensation most other enterprises employing more than 50 workers per shift. The government may transfer textile industries and printing establishments to political and social organizatons or cooperatives. Accompanying the nationalization program is a four-year plan of reconstruction.

The best source on Poland is the Sharp pamphlet mentioned above which contains the text of the decree and supplementary discussion. Leon Goldenberg and Laure Metzger, "The Polish Nationalization Law," Department of State Bulletin, October 13, 1946, is naturally concerned chiefly with compensation. On the four-year plan, see the short articles in Business Week on October 12, 1946 and January 11, 1947.

OTHER RESEARCH MATERIAL

Religion

Apart from numerous worthwhile articles in religious magazines, with which the average pacifist is familiar, several books have appeared which are worth reading. Donald Attwater's Modern Christian Revolutions (Devon-Adair, 1947) will prove interesting to pacifists who think of themselves in this category. Other offerings run the gamut from The Mind and Heart of Love by M. C. Dorcy (Henry Holt & Co., 1947), a study of divine and human love, to Gershom Scholem's Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (Schocken Books, 1947); from the study of Quaker relief, An Experiment in Friendship by David Henshaw (Putnam's, 1947), to the criticism of institutional Christianity by Joseph Needham, History Is On Our Side (MacMillan, 1947). See also on Quaker work Florence Sanville's "From the Icy Mountains to Coral Strands," Survey Graphic, April 1947 and Anna Curtis' The Quakers Take Stock, (Island Press, 1947).

On the conscientious objector, we have seen: Henry Geiger, "Conscience in California," Nation, March 22, 1947, about the trial of the CO.'s who refused to be slave laborers; Hollis S. Barber, "Religious Liberty v. Police Power: Jehovah's Witnesses," American Political Science Review, April 1947, a discussion on the court decisions affecting J.W.'s; Julien Cornell, "Exemption from the Draft: A Study in Civil Liberties," Yale Law Journal, January 1947, discussing all cases for exemption and arguing that objectors should be allowed final judicial review before induction; Markham P. Bryant, "The Thirteen Thousand," Antioch Review, Spring 1947, on the prospects of the C.O.'s and their principle complaints against the alternative service program; and "Conscientious Objectors and the Supreme Court," Social Service Review, December 1946.

Race

On the American scene, race relations continue in importance. A. G. Mezerik studies the problem in relation to its southern background in an excellent series entitled "Dixie in Black and White" in the Nation. The March 22, 1947 item is about southern fights against discrimination, especially by the Baptist convention. The second in the series, March 29, is about the Talmadge fight in Georgia; April 19 is about the liberal Gov. Folsom of Alabama; and the May 3 article is on Texas.

Jack H. Pollack describes the southern disenfranchisement of Negroes in "Literacy Tests: Southern Style," American Mercury, May 1947. A more extensive and scholarly treatment is the Columbia Law Review's "Negro Disenfranchisement—A Challenge to the Constitution," appearing in January 1947, which deals with white primacy laws, poll tax, etc. Dr. Howard Odum's The Way of the South (Macmillan, 1947) is a long awaited result of careful research.

Three articles on racial discrimination in relation to the government are Paul Blanshard, "Jim Crow at the Canal," Survey Graphic, May 1947; E. T. Hall, Jr., "Race Prejudice and Negro-White Relations in the Army," American Journal of Sociology, March 1947; and L. D. Reddick, "The Negro in the United States Navy During World War II," Journal of Negro History, April 1947. The Reddick article is the most encouraging—recording the development of racial relations in the navy from extremely discriminatory toward integration.

Legal aspects of discrimination are dealt with in Alex Elson and Leonard Schanfield, "Local Regulation of Discriminatory Employment Practices," Yale Law Journal, February 1947, which discusses the possible types of regulations; and C. A. Chick, "Some Recent United States Supreme Court Decisions Affecting the Rights of Negro Workers," Journal of Negro Education, Spring 1947. The decisions give Negroes the right to picket stores not employing Negroes, outlaw peonage, and prevent unions from discriminating against them in bargaining agreements. For more general observations on the problem, see Lloyd H. Fisher, The Problem of Violence: Observations on Race Conflict in Los Angeles, (American Council on Race Relations, 1946); Lyman Bryson, Louis Finkelstein and Robert M. MacIver, Approaches to Group Understanding, (Harpers, 1947); Eugenet Hartley, Problems in Prejudice, (Columbia University Press, 1947); and Goodwin Watson, Action for Unity (Harpers, 1947) being a review of what is being done to break down racial and religious barriers. Sinclair Lewis' Kingsblood Royal has created more than a ripple. A new approach to racial prejudice (it hurts your pocketbook) will be found in Bucklin Moore's The High Cost of Prejudice (Messner, 1947).

For better understanding the Negro people, we recommend: "Current Trends and Events of National Importance in Negro Education," Journal of Negro Education, Spring 1947, which includes material on teaching standards; Harry Washington Greene, Holders of Doctorates Among American Negroes, (Meador, 1946); Will Chasan, "Harlem's Aristocracy," American Mercury, June 1947; W. E. Burghart Du Bois, The World and Africa, (Viking, 1947).

On other minority problems, see Pauline Kibbe, Latin Americans in Texas, (Univ. of N. Mexico Press, 1947); Anne Emery, Tradition, (Vanguard, 1946) on the Nisei; Andrew W. Lind, Hawaii's Japanese: An Experiment in Democracy, (Princeton Univ. Press, 1947); and the excellent anthrology on Anti-Semitism, The Wine of Violence by Nathan Zuckerman (Association Press, 1947) as well as With Firmness in the Right by Cyrus Adler and Aaron Morgalith (Am. Jew. Comm., 1947) on American diplomatic action relating to Jews.

Labor

Peter F. Drucker, "Why Men Strike," Fortnightly, February 1947, puts managerial unfairness or appearance of it as the first cause of strikes, and insecurity as the last in a series of four; Benjamin M. Selekman, "Conflict and Cooperation in Labor Relations," Harvard Business Review, Spring 1947, is interested in the personal relations of the workers in the shop to each other; W. R. Dymond, "Union-Management Cooperation at the Toronto Factory of Leber Brothers Limited," Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, February 1947, a 41-page review; Symer H. Slichter, The Challenge of Industrial Relations, (Cornell Univ. Press, 1947); Russell L. Greenman and Elizabeth B. Greenman, Getting Along With Unions, (Harpers, 1947) on how to make union agreements work.

For pro-labor articles on workers' problems and their unions, see: Jack Barbash, "Union Leadership," Antioch Review, Spring 1947, characterizing the dominant concerns of various well-known union leaders; Kathryn Close, "Steel Makers: 1937-1947," Survey Graphic, March 1947, a review of the union's activities; Heinz Eulan, "Voices Without Smiles," Nation, April 5, 1947, about the wage schedule in the Bell system; A. H. Raskin, "How Miners Live," American Mercury, April 1947 on company towns, sanitation and mine dangers; Dale Kramer, "Follow the Leader," New Republic, April 14, 1947, on accident and wage figures and speculating on successors to Lewis.

On "The guaranteed wage," see the article by that name in Fortune, April 1947.

On a general labor policy, see John A. Fitch, "The New Congress and the Unions," Survey Graphic, April 1947, arguments on both sides of the various labor bills; and H. W. Metz and Meyer Jacobstein, A National Labor Policy, (Brookings Institute, 1947).

See also, History of the Labor Movement in the United States by Philip Foner (Internation, 1947).

America

There have been many articles which might be included under this heading but we shall refer only to a few books. John Gunther's Inside U. S. A. (Harpers, 1947) is better than most Gunther's "Inside" series—perhaps because he stayed in America longer—but is fairly nationalistic. A much sounder research job from the economic approach is America's Needs and Resources by J. Dewhurst and Associates (Twentieh Century Fund, 1947).

Those who are interested in planning will find American Planning by Cleveland Rodgers (Harpers, 1947) and Communitas by Percival and Paul Goodman (Univ. of Chicago, 1947) most instructive.

Our government, and particularly the Supreme Court comes in for careful analyses in Edward Corwin's Total War and the Constitution, (Knopf, 1947), Charles Curtis, Lions Under the Throne, (Mifflen, 1947) and Wesley McEune's The Nine Young Men (Harpers, 1947). See also President and Congress by Wilfred Binkley (Knopf, 1947).

World Organization

The Research Bureau's study of functional international organizations last quarter makes it desirable to keep this material current.

On the United Nations as a whole, a six-page summary of recent developments is presented in "The State of World Organization," United Nations World, April, 1947.

On the Economic and Social Council, the best article this time is "Economic and Social Council. Achievements of the Fourth Session," U. N. Weekly Bulletin, April 8, 1947. On the various specialized activities of the Council, see: George A. Morlock, "Resolutons Adopted by the Economic and Social Council Relating to Narcotic Drugs," Department of State Bulletin, April 20, 1947; Marion M. Montague, "UN Progress in the Social Field," World Affairs, Spring 1947, about child welfare and housing. In the U. N. Weekly Bulletin issue of March 4, 1947, see the articles "Population Commissions' Program—Groundwork for International Organization," and "Commission on Status of Women, First Session Completed and Plan of Work Evolved." In the March 11 issue, see "Economic Commission for Europe Planned," and "Links with Economic and Social Council, Non-Governmental Organizations' Consultative Status." In the March 18 issue, see "Debate on Employment Policy, Economic and Social Council Discusses Commission's Report." This issue also contains the very important "Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East," an 8-page full study of the situation.

On the other functional agencies, see "New Transport Agencies Envisaged, Transport and Communications Commission Reports," U. N. Weekly Bulletin, March 4, 1947, a long article discussing the recommendation for a World Shipping Organization as a permanent successor to ECITO; John A. Loftus, "Report on ILO Petroleum Industry Committee Meeting," Department of State Bulletin, March 30, 1947; Herbert J. Abraham, "The General Conference of UNESCO, Paris, The Program in Action," Department of State Bulletin, April 13, 1947, a description of the principles of operation; Byron Dexter, "UNESCO Faces Two Worlds," Foreign Affairs, April 1947, an excellent discussion of the earlier organizations in the field and of the Russian approach. The "Atomic Energy Commission's Report" is discussed in the U. N. Weekly Bulletin, March 4 and 11, 1947. The first of these gives the report and the USSR proposals in parallel columns.

The best source on United Nations relief work is the April 1947 issue of Survey Midmonthly which devotes the major portion of the issue to articles on the 1947 crisis and what is being done by various agencies. See also: W. R. Gordon, "What Has UNRRA Done?" Fortnightly, February 1947, a good statistical article; Donald S. Howard, "After UNRRA—What?" Survey Graphic, April 1947; William L. Clayton, "Post-UNRRA Relief: Purpose and Method," Department of State Bulletin. March 9, 1947, a statement of what the United States proposes to do; "Congressional Hearings on IRO Constitution," same issue, a statement by Acheson; and John C. Charnow, "The International Children's Emergency Fund," same publication, March 16, 1947.

On the trusteeship system, see Elizabeth H. Armstrong and William Cargo, "The Inauguration of the Trusteeship System of the United Nations," Department of State Bulletin, March 23, 1947, a summary of the various developments.

International trade organizations are the main theme of the Spring 1947 issue of World Affairs, which includes two articles, C. Thayer White, "Proposed International Trade Organization," and Huston Thompson, "International Trade Tribunal," and book review section on "Cartels." The best article we have seen on the International Bank is Nathanial Weyl and Max J. Wasserman, "The International Bank, an Instrument of World Economic Reconstruction," American Economic Review, March 1947, an excellent discussion of the theory and practice involved. For details on personnel and the problems in getting started, see Ladislas Farago, "World Bank: Council of Securities," United Nations World, April 1947.

On another aspect of trade organization, see John K. Havemeyer, "The Background and Present Status of the Inter-American Coffee Agreement," Department of State Bulletin, March 2, 1947; Francis A. Linville, "Draft Memorandum of Agreement Prepared for International Wheat Conference," same publication, March 16, 1947; and Joseph S. Davis, International Commodity Agreements, Hope, Illusion, or Menace? (Carnegie Endowment, 1947). On the problem of how to have trade organization with totalitarian nations, see George C. McGhee, "State Trading and Totalitarian Economics," Department of State Bulletin, March 2, 1947, a description of the kinds of state trade; and C. Hartley Grattan, "If We Really Want International Trade," Harpers, April 1947, a discussion of the problems with the hope that the United States will support a system that makes concession to totalitarian countries.

For general surveys of the situation, the article is James T. Shotwell, "Trade Disarmament," Survey Graphic, March 1947, and the book is Mordecai Ezekiel, Towards World Prosperity, (Harpers, 1947) which presents the views of 20 international experts on industry and agriculture.

On the government theory side consult A. C. Ewing, The Individual, The State and World Government (MacMillan, 1947); Karl Loewenstein, Political Reconstruction (MacMillan, 1947) and Joseph Schumpeter's Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy (Harpers, 1947).

Great Britain

Miscellaneous articles on Britain and the Empire not treated in our main article are: Harold J. Laski, "Britain Without Empire," Nation, April 12, 1947; Vernon McKay, "Empire in Transition—British, French and Dutch Colonial Plans," Foreign Policy Reports, May 1, 1947; "Arms and Arithmetic," New Statesman and Nation, March 15, 1947 discussing the size and disposition of British troops abroad; Harley V. Usill, "West Africa—A study of Progress," World Affairs, Spring 1947, a pro-British story of British administration there; William A. Robson, "Post-War Municipal Elections in Great Britain," American Political Science Review, April 1947; Keith Hutchison, "The British Budget," Nation, April 26, 1947, a good explanation; Winston Churchill, "The Labor Government's Failure," Commercial and Financial Chronicle, April 3, 1947, an extensive criticism on all fronts; Maurice Edelman, "An Economic Entente," New Statesman and Nation, March 8, 1947.

Far East

On the Japanese occupation, we recommend: Mark Starr, "Japanese Trade Unions Today," American Teacher, March 1947; Oscar Weigert, "Labor Policies and Programs in Japan Under the Occupation," Monthly Labor Review, February 1947; William Costello, "Report from Tokyo," New Republic, March 31, 1947; Lawrence K. Rosinger, "The Occupation of Japan," Foreign Policy Reports, May 15, 1947; and "Submission of U. S. Draft Trusteeship Agreement for Japanese Mandated Island," Department of State Bulletin, March 9, 1947.

On the disputed issue of Korea, Robert T. Oliver takes the anti-Russian side in "The Impasse in Korea," American Mercury, April 1947 and "The Tragedy of Korea," World Affairs, Spring 1947. The pro-Russian position is presented in "US Policy Act II—Korea," New Republic, May 5, 1947.

On China, two current articles are C. W. Y. Meng, "The Chinese People Get in a Word," United Nations World, April 1947 and Paul M. A. Linegarner, Yale Review, Spring 1947. The first holds that Chinese public opinion wants the Americans to withdraw and Chiang to reform; the second calls for Russo-American unity in China, and seems to think Chinese unity would follow.

Miscellaneous articles are P. T. Bauer, "Nationalism and Politics in Maylaya," Foreign Affairs, April 1947; and Emil J. Sady, "Report on the South Seas Conference," Department of State Bulletin, March 16, 1947. See also Harold Isaac's book, No Peace For Asia (MacMillan, 1947) and The Future of Freedom in the Orient by Ralph Conistor (Norton, 1947).

Near and Middle East

Material on the Near and Middle East is plentiful now because of the various intense situations there and because of the appearance of a new quarterly, the Middle East Journal. On the Arabian countries, see: George Lenczowski, "The Communist Movement in Iran," Middle East Journal, January 1947, about the working class organization, Tudeh, which he says is a minority group supported by Russia; Andrew Roth, "Backstage in the Persian Theater," Nation, May 3, 1947, a more pro-Tudeh article; Andrew Roth, "Iraq: Black Gold and Poverty," Nation, April 19, 1947, about the oil field workers and the government and its manipulated elections; Raymond F. Mikesell, "Monetary Problems of Saudi Arabia," Middle East Journal, April 1947, which gives some insight on the oil companies and the general economy.

On the problem of Arabian expansion, the Arab League itself is defended by Cecil A. Hourani in "The Arab League in Perspective," Middle East Journal, April 1947 as a liberal union rather than Pan-Arab. The controversy between Egyptian Arabs and Britain is discussed by Robert Henriques in "Who Should Rule the Sudan?" Nation, May 10, 1947. On the Palestine problem, the two most interesting articles we saw were Edwin Samuel, "The Jewish Communal Village in Palestine," Political Quarterly, April-June 1947; and Eliahu Ben-Horin, "Palestine: Realities and Illusions," Atlantic, April 1947. The several books on the problem, all more or less pro-Zionist are: Bartley C. Crum, Behind the Silken Curtain, (Simon and Shuster, 1947); Richard Crossman, Palestine Mission, (Harpers, 1947) by a British Member of Parliament who was on the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry; Sophie A. Udin (ed), The Palestine Yearbook: Review of Events July 1945 to September 25, 1946, (Zionist, 1946) and Palestine, A Study of Jewish, Arab and British Policies, (2 Vols., Yale Univ. Press, 1947), advertised as the definitive study prepared by Christians and Jews.

The very interesting Inter-Asian Relations Conference which met in India in March 1947 is discussed in Phillips Talbot, "Revolt in Asia," New Republic, April 28, 1947; and Achi Rangaswami, "Asia Prepares for Independence," United Nations World, May 1947. On India see also D. F. Karaka, I've Shed My Tears (Appleton-Century, 1947) and India's Charter of Freedom by the Indian Government.

A promising book on the culture, history, and social problem of the East is E. A. Spenser's The United States and the Near East. (Harvard Univ. Press, 1947).

Europe

One of the most interesting articles on Europe is Reinhold Niebuhr, "Labor Coalition in Holland," Nation, April 19, 1947, about the new Dutch Labor Party which is in a government coalition with the Catholics against the Calvinist partes. As to France, see Foreign Affairs for April 1947 which contains Andre Geraud, "The New French Constitution;" Charles Rest, "The French Financial Dilemma;" and Henry W. Ehrmann, "French Labor Goes Left." On Spain, for current developments see J. Alvarez del Vayo, "Francisco Franco," Nation, May 3, 1947.

In Eastern Europe, attention was centered on Greece, following the announcement of the Truman policy. The Nation's reporter on Greece, Constantine Poulos, discusses the situation in "What America Could Do in Greece" in the March 29, 1947 issue and "Report from Athens" in April 14. Holding that the new King Paul is even more totalitarian than was George, he believes we should send an economic mission with authority to stop expenditures if necessary. The text of the FAO report on Greece is given in "Economic Reports on Greece," World Report, March 25, 1947; summarized in "Economic Rehabilitation of Greece, FAO Mission Recommends Comprehensive Measures," U. N. Weekly Bulletin, April 1, 1947; and commented on in "What Greece Really Needs," New Republic, March 31, 1947. The plan of the American economic mission is discussed in Laura Vitray, "A Five Year Plan for Greece," U. N. World, May 1947. The recommendations of it and other missions are reviewed in George Britt, "The Greeks," Survey Graphic, May 1947.

The various currents in Italian politics are discussed in as many articles. See: Ignazio Silone, "The Crisis of Italian Socialism," The Call, April 2, 1947, on the split in the Socialist Party over unity with the Communists; Giuseppe Faravelli, "The Crisis in Italian Socialism," Modern Review, May 1947, a shorter account; Ernest O. Hauser, "Is Italy Growing Another Mussolini?" Saturday Evening Post, March 29, 1947, about Giannini and the Liberal and Democratic Front; and three articles by J. Alvarex del Vayox in the Nation: "Italy on the Hard Road Back," in March 22, on the Resistance; "Italy's Place in the World," in April 26, 1947, on Count Sforza; and "Vatican Versus Left in Italy," in April 5.

The best article on Germany is Joachim Joesten, "The Strange Ways of German Democracy," Antioch Review, Spring 1947, an account of the electoral system and results. See also: Feliz E. Hirsch, "The German Balance Sheet," Current History, March 1947; Jonathan Blow, "German Approaches the Cross-Roads," Quarterly Review, January 1947; George Lobbenberg, "The German Cartels and AMG," Nation, March 15, 1947; Allen W. Dulles, "Alternatives for Germany," Foreign Affairs, April 1947; M. S. Davis, "The New German Trade Union," Fortnightly, March 1947; and William P. Cumming, "What is Happening in the German Universities," South Atlantic Quarterly, April 1947, very good with detailed criticism and recommendations. A history of the Austrian situation since the depression is in Sir Walford Selby, "The Austrian Problem," Contemporary Review, March 1947. A history since the agreement of June 1946 is in Velma Hastings Cassidy, "The U. S. in the Allied Administration of Austria," Department of State Bulletin, March 9, 1947.

On the still more controversial parts of Europe, see: Edgar P. Young, "People's Republic Bulgaria," Contemporary Review, March 1947; Leland Stowe, "Hungary's Agrarian Revolution," Foreign Affairs, April 1947; and "Finland: the Next Phase," New Statesman and Nation, March 22, 1947; all of which are in favor of the current governments. The articles on Poland are not: Dorothy Thompson, "Poland Two Years After Yalta," American Mercury, May 1947; and Sidney B. Fay, "Poland's Troubled Elections," Current History, March 1947.

The most useful work on Russia we have seen is "Bibliography, Books and Articles on Russia Published in 1946," by Peter Pertzoff in Russian Review, Spring 1947, which includes listings in scientific and cultural journals. For articles, see: J. J. Abt, "The Soviet Wage System: The Role of the Trade Unions in Determining the Total Wage Fund as Part of the Economic Plan," Soviet Russia Today, March 1947; Walter Kolarz, "Russian Colonization," Modern Review, May 1947, about Siberian and other settlement; Keith Hutchison, "Everybody's Business — Russia and Reparation," Nation, March 22, 1947; Victor A. Kravchenko, "Who Will Succeed Stalin?" Saturday Evening Post, March 22, 1947; James Burnham, "The Goal of Soviet Policy," American Mercury, April 1947. The Spring issue of Public Opinion Quarterly is devoted to "American and Soviet Union," discussing Russian publications and public opinion. John Strohm's Just Tell the Truth, (Scribners) and Over At Uncle Joe's are popular books on Russia.

The American peace treaties with Europe are discussed by James F. Byrnes in "Senate Consideration of Peace Treaties With Italy, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary," Department of State Bulletin, March 16, 1947. Compare this with Stephen Bonsal's Suitors and Suppliants, (Prentice-Hall, 1947), a study of the small nations at Versailles.

Latin America

The best survey of Latin America is Serafino Romualdi, "Labor and Democracy in Latin America," Foreign Affairs, April 1947, which is by an AFL man who led a recent delegation to investigate affairs in Argentina. On the totalitarian aspects of South American politics, see: Albert C. Hicks, "Election Day in Santo Domingo," Nation, May 10, 1947; William L. Munger, "How Peron Enslaves Argentine Labor," American Mercury, May 1947; Bryce Oliver, "The Totalitarian Threat to Brazil," American Mercury, April 1947; and Graham Hovey, "Uruguay Walks a Tightrope," New Republic, April 28, 1947. On Mexico, see Anita Brenner, "Aleman: Mexico's Man of Promise," United Nations World, April 1947; Alexander H. Uhl, "The Nineteenth Century Comes to Mexico," New Republic, May 5, 1947, an extensive article with graphs which contends Mexico is moving toward native capitalism; and Lilo Linke "Mexico and the Land," Fortnightly, December 1946. R. A. Humphreys presents The Evolution of Modern Latin America (Oxford, 1947) and Wenzill Brown turns attention to the Caribbean in Angry Men—Laughing Men (Greenberg, 1947).

War Machinery

Here there is much book material, especially occasioned by the atom bomb. Liddell Hart's Revolution in Warfare (Yale Univ., 1947) is particularly timely. See also: Ansley Coale, The Problem of Reducing Vulnerability to Atomic Bombs, (Princeton Univ., 1947) and Treason's Peace by Howard Ambruster (Brechhurst, 1947) on the I. G. Farben industrial combine.

We recommend as of special interest to pacifists, "Social Implications of Modern Science," the January 1947 issue of The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, which contains articles on "The Problem of Values," "Science and Social Change." More specialized is the forum on "Should the Scientists Resist Military Intrusion?" in the American Scholar, Spring 1947, with Vannemar Bush, Philip Morrison, Louis N. Ridenour, Seymour Harris, Horbert Weiner, and Donald Young. See Ellis M. Zacharias, Secret Mission, (Putnams, 1947) which says atom bombing was unnecessary.

Also interesting are: Mary E. Harnden, "War Department Plan for Universal Military Training: a Criticism," School and Society, March 1, 1947; "Occupation Cost: Five Times as Large in 1947 as in 1919," U. S. News, March 7, 1947; Sylvanus M. Duvall, War and Human Nature, Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 125, published in 1947, which sees frustration as the cause of war. Of psychological value are: Yank, The G.I. Story of the War (Duell, Sloane, 1947) and All But Me and Thee by Brig. Gen. Elliott Cooke on psychoneurosis in the Army.

Other miscellaneous works include:

John Mitrany, American Interpretations, (Contact, 1946); John Fisher, "The Lost Liberals," Harpers, May 1947; and Barrows Dunham, Man Against Myth, (Little, Brown, 1947).

On business, we recommend from Keith Hutchison's series in the Nation, "Are Profits Too High?" in March 15, 1947; "Undistributed Profits" in April 5; "'Fair Trade' For Whom?" in May 3; and "The Vanisburg Building Boom," in the May 19 issue. Presented to the Southern Sociological Society

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE SOUTHERN SOCIOLOGICAL SOCIETY:

There were many things which your Committee on Research would like to have done. As usual, however, it is composed of busy people who live in widely scattered places and who could not even get together for a meeting because this would mean travelling long distances at their own expense. As usual, we have conducted our Committee discussions by mail--a slow and cumbersome interaction process. Under such circumstances, the Committee can do little more than scratch the surface of the research situation and report a few findings and observations to the members of the Society.

Early in January the Committee on Research sent a questionnaire to the 296 persons who were members of the Society as of January 31, 1948. This questionnaire asked for three things: (1) opinions on a proposed research workshop, (2) information on the proportion of time devoted to research or other functions, and (3) a listing of works published during the year 1948. The results of this survey, together with a few general comments, constitute the report of your Committee.

Up to the time this report was written, we had received returns from 183, or 61.8%, of the members of the Society. This number is so much larger than usual that it calls for some explanation. No doubt the questions relating to the possibility of holding a research workshop in connection with the annual meeting attracted replies from some members who might not have taken the trouble to reply otherwise. But a more important factor, in all probability, was the enclosure of a stamped and addressed return envelope with the communication which went to the members. There was no post-card follow-up for members who had not replied after thirty days. Apparently the "conscience value" of the return stamped envelope was rather strong. A member of your Committee, who wished to try this experiment, is absorbing the additional cost. However, since the difference in the cost of return stamped envelopes and the post-card follow-up is only about $5.00, we suggest that the Society might wish to authorize the Committee on Research in the future to consider this a legitimate expense item.

I. The Proposed Research Workshop

The Research Committee for last year, under the chairmanship of C. Horace Hamilton, collected some interesting statements from members on the question, "What do you consider the major weaknesses of sociological research in the South to be?" Those who attended the 1948 annual meeting will recall that there was some discussion of ways and means of improving the sociological research stiuation in the South. Certain perennial problems were recognized, such as: too much teaching lead, lack of thorough grounding in social theory, lack of familiarity with new research techniques, need for more cooperation between research people, need for more financial support for research. Various suggestions were made, among them the suggestion that the Society might sponsor a Research Workshop which would bring together those who were interested in trying to do something about these problems.

When President Hayes appointed the present Research Committee, he reminded it of the Workshop suggestion. He also took up with an official of the Social Science Research Council the possibility of the Society's applying for a grant in behalf of the Workshop. Your Committee was in something of a quandary, since it was operating on a suggestion rather than on formal instructions Should we proceed to set up a Workshop and hope that there would be enough attendance to make it successful, or should we sound out the whole membership on the idea and ascertain the probable attendance? Naturally the Chairman had to assume the responsibility for certain decisions and procedures. He began by corresponding with other members of the Research Committee. While the reactions toward the Workshop idea were, on the whole, favorable, there was considerable variation of opinion on what sort of thing the Workshop might best do, and several members of the Committee had serious reservations concerning the worthwhileness of the project. It was decided to include in the annual research questionnaire some questions relating to the proposed Workshop. Members of the Committee agreed that the Chairman would have to make a decision on the basis of the returns and that a probable attendance of at least fifty persons would be the minimum on which to base a favorable decision.

By January 22 we had received 158 replies. Of these, 122 or about 80%, favored the idea of the Workshop. Exactly 50 members replied that they thought they could attend a Workshop for two days preceding the annual meeting. This looked rather good, but there was room for considerable doubt as to whether more than 25 or 30 of these could actually get time off from their work and attend at their own expense. The most discouraging aspect of the returns, however, was that among the 20 who said that they could help conduct a Workshop at their own expense, there were only four or five of our outstanding research people. It seemed to the Chairman that we would need a better representation of experienced research scholars if we were to conduct a successful workshop. While pondering over these matters, the Chairman received a letter from the Social Science Research Council saying that it would not be possible for the Council to consider a grant during its present fiscal year. The Chairman then wrote the members of the Research Committee and President Hayes that in his opinion it was not wise to proceed with the Workshop during the present year.

Since members of the Society may be interested in the final returns (183) on the questions relating to the Workshop, we present them here.

	YES	NO	DOUBTFUL, NO ANSWER, ETC.
IN FAVOR OF WORKSHOP IDEA	142	12	29
WOULD ATTEND WORKSHOP	57	72	54
WOULD HELP CONDUCT WORKSHOP AT OWN EXPENSE	22	114	47
WOULD HELP PROVIDED A GRANT IS OBTAINED	43	94	46

While it seemed wise not to try to undertake the Workshop this year, your Committee is aware that the above tabulation indicates a very strong interest in the idea of a Workshop. Therefore your Committee makes the following recommendations:

1. That the members present at the annual meeting vote on the question of whether they wish to have the Society undertake a Research Workshop during the coming year.

2. That, if this is the wish of the members, they vote on certain specific instructions as to time, place, length, and functions of the Workshop.

The next Research Committee, or a special committee on Workshop, operating under definite instructions, could proceed at once to try to obtain a grant, and it would have plenty of time to set up a really attractive program for a Research Workshop. Please think over these matters and come to the annual meeting prepared to discuss them.

II. Research And Other Activities Of Members

Members were asked to indicate on the research questionnaire the approximate proportions of their time devoted to research, teaching, administration, and other activities. The results of this survey supplement the information reported by the 1947 Committee on Research, and they should be of some interest to members of the Society.

Number of questionnaires sent out 296
Number of persons replying 183
Number not answering research questions 13
Number of replies used in tabulations 170

Number reporting some time spent in research 119
Number reporting no time spent in research 51

Note: In some of the tables which follow, the following abbreviations will be used:

R for Research — A for Administration
T for Teaching — O for Other Activities

III. Comments

The foregoing tabulations merely confirm what most of us already knew. For one thing, full-time research workers among our ranks are very rare creatures. Only 5 of the 119 persons who reported some research activity are devoting their full time to research, and all of these are working in federally supported programs in state colleges of agriculture. Also we see, by referring to Table 1, that 108, or 63.5%, of our 170 respondents are devoting either no time or less than 25% of their time to research. Furthermore, as might be expected, teaching is the main job of our members. Of the 170 reporting, 145 are doing teaching or teaching combined with other functions. Again, research comes off rather poorly when combined with other functions. Of 45 persons who combine research with one other function, 31 are devoting less than half time to research; and of 47 who combine research with two other functions, 31 are devoting less than one-third time to research. Finally, we might point out that our tabulations actually overstate the amount of regular working time given to research, because many of our members have to "make" their own time if they are to get any research done. Quite a few who indicated that they devote five or ten per cent of their time to research appended such notes as, "On my own time," or "This includes Saturdays and holidays."

The main problems in our research situation, as viewed by your Committee, are as follows:

1. The need for more money and time for research work. This is largely a problem of finance and administration in the individual institutions with which our members are associated. The average institution simply does not have the money to afford the "luxury" of reducing teaching leads so that staff members can devote more time to research.

2. The need for a better quality of research work. Due to lack of time, lack of money, poor training, failure to keep in touch with improvements in theory and methodology, and other factors, there is undoubtedly a good deal of sub-standard "research" being done. The problem is largely one of individual training and initiative. In so far as the Society might undertake to do something about this situation, the best approach would seem to be to institute a continuing series of research conferences or workshops which might retrain and stimulate a sizeable number of research people. This, of course, would involve the problem of obtaining a grant from some foundation which is interested in our problems.

3. The need for more cooperation and coordination in research work. We believe that even under present conditions there is much that could be done by individuals and institutions to achieve better cooperation and coordination in research projects. There could be, and should be, more cooperation between the larger and more favored institutions and the smaller colleges, between white and Negro institutions, and between educational institutions and government agencies.

The following comments made by members of the Research Committee in the course of their "meetings by mail" are quite relevant to this discussion of these problems:

> ... The plan, as I understood it, was for the Research Committee to develop further plans for a coordinated research program for the South. I, for one, am still not very hopeful that an all-around acceptable program can be worked out or that a very high level of region-wide research may be obtained in this manner. We do not have an Oak Ridge Center in sociology, with numerous related probelms that can be "farmed out" to institutions with lucrative grants to go along with them, and the results then reintegrated at the Center....Frankly, I do not believe the possibility of establishing a Center is very realistic at this time...

A committee is not a research center; it is so difficult for a committee of persons scattered over a large geographic region to do an effective job of directing research and of administering the funds so as to obtain the greatest possible results....

One alternative is .... to find out through questionnaires sent to the membership how many persons now working on research projects, or contemplating undertaking projects, think their research could profit through having sociologists in other parts of the region contribute to it by making similar, sample, or control studies in the localities in which these other sociologists reside. This would call not only for an opinion, but also for a presentation of enough material about the projects to spell out in rather concrete terms just what would be involved in the collaboration .... (Note: This excellent suggestion came too late to be included in the questionnaire this year. Perhaps the next Research Committee would like to follow up on it.)

..... I think our Research Committee might be rendering a real service if we found some way of stimulating and to some extent guiding research by those sociologists who are struggling all alone at some small college and who feel somewhat "out of the swim of things." For two years I was at _____ College and would have welcomed the chance to work with several other sociologists in other institutions on some common project on which we had agreed upon procedure and scope of study. The Research Committee might serve as a channel for crystallizing some such cooperative activities.

It is my belief that one possible action the Committee might take is to select some willing and capable sociologist, either in or out of the region, to critically appraise the research turned out during the previous year in the region. This could be undertaken by the Chairman* of the Committee or by the Committee as a whole, but, as suggested above, it could be done by a competent person not of the Committee. (Note:* The Chairman did not take readily to this part of the suggestion!)

.....

I wonder if the Committee could take the function of improving and stimulating sociological research seriously enough to attempt to set up a set of standards which might be useful in facilitating research by college faculty members. I have in mind such things as a suggested maximum teaching load, suggested possible facilities for doing research, and the encouragement of faculty members to attend scientific meetings. Of course, the corollary to this would be the determination of the extent to which various colleges approximate these standards,.... If this were done it would then be possible to draw up a statement for submission to college administrators as to ideal standards and actual practice.... I believe that this could be done in such a way as not to compromise members of the Society, nor embarrass or antagonize college administrators.

The above comments represent the thinking of several of the members of the Research Committee. So far the Committee has not devised any ways of implementing good suggestions except by bringing them to the attention of members of the Society. Unfortunately, because of the impossibility of holding a meeting at the crucial time and because of a lack of continuity in the work of the Committee, the Committee does not begin to cut its wisdom teeth until about the end of its period of service. More than one member has commented on the lack of continuity, and one has suggested that the Committee could serve more efficiently if the personnel were kept intact over a period of several years.

We present in Section IV a listing of publications by members of the Southern Sociological Society during 1948. The list is not complete, of course, since it is based on the returns from the Research Committee Questionnaire. Of the 183 members who replied, 50 reported one or more publications. In many cases the bibliographical information given was not complete as to periodical volume numbers, dates, pages, etc. Book reviews, with the exception of two or three which seemed to make some contribution to method or theory, have been excluded.

Your Committee has considerable doubt as to whether this sort of list has enough value to members of the Society to justify its continuation. It takes time for members to report their publications accurately, and, at the best, from one-third to one-half of our members will fail to respond. It takes time and expense to compile the report and mimeograph it. Then, too, a good deal of the bibliographical information is readily available in the periodical indexes and book lists found in any good library. Therefore we raise the question, How useful have you found the sort of listing of publications which was first tried last year and which we have repeated this year? It may be that the Research Committee would do well to discontinue sending out questionnaires or publishing lists and devote all of its limited time and resources to the preparation of better Research Section programs at the annual meetings. Please think about these questions and be prepared to express your opinions at the annual meeting.

Due to the pressure of other duties and to a miscalculation of the date on which this report would have to be delivered to the Secretary of the Society for mailing, the Chairman of the Research Committee has had to proceed with mimeographing before receiving the formal approval of all members of the Committee. The report is therefore, at the moment, "unofficial".

CHRISTIAN CONCEPTS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR

By Hugh Brimm

There is nothing of news in the statement that we are living in times of tremendous stress and strain. Internationally we are divided into the opposing camps of communism and democracy. Within our own country there are other marks of division. Economically we are divided into the ranks of capital and labor. Lines of race, religion, political affiliation, and national origin further divide, segregate, and intensify the already complex problems of human relations.

As Christians we should be both alert to and concerned about these vital problems. A major part of our responsibility as "peacemakers" is to promote understanding in human relations by demonstrating the better way of Christian love.

In this discussion we are concerning ourselves, not with the whole area of human relations, but with only one aspect—human relations in modern business. Here, we are face to face with the problems of economic group relationships as represented by management or capital on the one hand and labor on the other. It shall be our objective to find an answer to the following question, "How can management and labor work together in ways to attain industrial peace?"

First, let us face the staggering realization that American industrial output is measured today in terms of hundreds of billions of dollars. Industrial expansion is going on all about us at breath-taking speed. This expansion is resulting in greater employment, higher per-capita income, and more leisure time for the American worker.

In 1850, an average of twenty-seven cents worth of goods and services were turned out in an hour's work. The average working time that year was twelve hours a day for six days a week. Today the average hourly output per man is more than five times as great and the work week has been reduced by almost one-half! We are also using nearly 100 times as much mechanical energy per man-hour of work.

We who live in the southern regions of our great nation are witnessing one of the greatest industrial developments of modern times. Agriculture, the long-

WHY CHURCHMEN OPPOSE UMT

By Donald B. Cloward

If Universal Military Training is good for American youth, why one might ask, is the strongest opposition to it coming from churchmen, who from the beginning in America have pioneered in character building through the family, the school, and the church? Yet the best informed churchmen can generally be found vigorously opposing any program of UMT for our eighteen-year-olds.

Were I a member of the Congress, I would want to weigh carefully this fact before voting for UMT. Surely this sentiment is not to be dismissed as either Communist-inspired nor yet the overflow of romantic pacifism. For these same churchmen have been forthright in exposing Communism as antithetical to Christian faith and practice. Moreover, only a small minority among them can readily be classified as pacifists. They largely supported action in Korea and have bowed to the necessity of selective service as a crisis measure.

What Is Good for Youth?

But it should cause a congressman to ponder when the church leadership stands almost solidly against a bill which the Defense Department says is wise and good and useful. Religious leaders make no claim to being military experts. They respect the peculiar gifts of men trained in military combat and in times of crisis have put the lives of themselves and their children wholly in the hands of the generals and the admirals. But if the military is now claiming competence in what is good Americanism for our youth, then it is time to challenge them.

Isaiah, out of the distant past, had a word of profound wisdom for our confused day when he said: "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter."

The military record is bad—very bad. Ask anyone who has tried to live a normal civilian life in the proximity of a military establishment what happens to community life as a result of a large concentration of troops nearby? Every vice already present in the community is increased a hundredfold. It seems to be an inevitable consequence

POSITIVE STEPS TOWARD PEACE IN OUR TIME

Christians have their own divine commission to proclaim the kingdom of God and His righteousness at home and abroad. God is a God of judgment as well as of mercy. In His sight all nations, including our own, and all men, including ourselves, have left undone those things which they ought to have done and done those things which they ought not to have done. We are called to recognize the just condemnation of His judgment but if we turn to Him in repentance and faith we shall avail ourselves of His mercy. We are called to be steadfast in prayer for all the peoples of the world that they may learn the things that belong to their peace; for our nation and our government, that they may become willing to serve the purposes of God.

Powerful forces have pushed mankind to the brink of an awful abyss. The first and urgent task is to check these forces. Therefore, these are not suggestions for a long range program for building peace—these are immediate steps for the present. It is imperative that we take them lest we lose the basic democratic principles upon which our way of life rests.

Here, then, are ways in which each of us can work, ways that will unite us in a world of good-will.

1. Redouble our efforts to reconcile men with God.

To this basic task we must re-dedicate ourselves with renewed devotion. The peace of God is the only peace which will endure. It can come only when men know Him as a child lovingly knows its own father. Our resources in the realm of the spiritual, unlike the military and material resources of war, are limitless. It was not an atom bomb that made Saul of Tarsus into Paul, the flaming evangel for Christ; it was not bacteriological warfare that lifted the Roman Empire off its hinges, but it was the power of God working through the lives of those who prayed for spiritual resources to be channeled through their lives.

This is a time for prayer. Also it is a time for action. Men of good will must promptly lay hold of the means at hand to increase the margin of safety against war. This is a task in which every one can play a constructive part.

time keystone of Southern economy, has been made to share its place in the sun with new and rapidly growing industries. In 1946, for example, four of the five states which led the nation in industrial construction contracts were Georgia, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. Factories, large and small, are becoming the core of industrial communities all over the South where once open country and rolling fields were all that met the human eye.

This is the "new South," an industrial South, rich in raw materials, rich in hydro-electric power, and rich in human resources from which can be drawn an abundant labor supply.

Human Factors

These are some of the economic factors that measure our story of national success. But there are other factors, equally important, if not more so. They are the human factors, the men with the wealth to provide the factories and the men with the skill to operate them. Full production, as we know it today, is by no means an accidental development of economic and technological forces. It is largely the result of the improvement of human relations.

Production was first expanded when men came together to pool their capital resources and to unite into manufacturing associations. Such was the "organization" of capital. The next step forward came when laboring men and women united into voluntary associations for the purpose of dealing with management.

Organized labor in America is more than one hundred and fifty years old. Behind are long years of bitter struggle for economic justice as opposed to sweatshops, the lockout, blacklists, and the exploitation of women and child labor. Labor's only alternative to organization was serfdom. It has struggled for organization, for its rights and for human benefits because it did not want that serfdom. In this process of organization, labor has developed with management a new technique, collective bargaining, an indispensable technique to modern business and our industrial strength.

Collective Bargaining

Through the processes of collective bargaining, contracts and agreements are reached. Labor unions are demonstrating more and more that they are responsible organizations in carrying out their contracts. However, on the other hand, many in the general public have the feeling that labor is not at all reliable, that labor is always on strike in violation of its contracts. This is not true. It is a fact that when management and labor are in periods of strife and of differences resulting in strikes and work stoppages, the press and radio give much space and time to the crisis struggle. On the other hand, when negotiations are conducted without strife, notice is not given at all.

For example, in 1946, when there were more strikes and work stoppages than in any recent year, there were more than 200,000 contracts negotiated between management and labor. Less than five per cent of these resulted in strikes. In other words more than ninety-five per cent of the contracts were settled to the mutual satisfaction of both groups.

In a number of recent studies and reports from large corporations, independent research groups are pointing to the co-operative achievements of industrial peace between management and labor. The National Planning Association, composed of leaders from the ranks of both management and labor, is currently making a series of studies on the "Causes of Industrial Peace." When completed it will be a detailed report on the labor relations of fifteen large corporations in America.

The results of these studies are making clear the following propositions:

(1) Company profit and good industrial relations are reconcilable and in fact essential to each other;

(2) Industrial organizations are social as well as economic and technological structures. The welfares of a company and its employees are inseparable;

(3) A worker is an individual as well as a union-member and employee. His dignity, recognition, and job-satisfaction are vital to high productivity.

(4) These values of employer and employee must be mutually communicated, understood, and observed.

Industrial relations programs incorporating these principles are working. They have provided a basis for co-operation, in concerns which have established them, that has increased production, profit per unit produced, and the material and spiritual well-being of their employees.

In their relationships both management and labor have come to realize that there are certain fundamentals of human nature which cannot be ignored. These cannot be ignored if human relations are to be creative and peaceable.

First is the essential dignity of man. Every man has certain basic human rights which must be respected. Such dignity demands self-expression, an opportunity to advance, and a sense that one has attained a point of usefulness in life. Second, man must have the esteem and respect of others. More than anything else he wants to be recognized as a person and to possess the confidence that he will be treated like a human being in all relationships.

Third, man yearns for survival. Food, clothing, housing, and other essentials are rightly his. He wants to know that he has access to them.

Finally, man reaches out for security. It is not sufficient that he have bread for today, but that there also be bread for tomorrow. He needs to have the confidence that he will be able to face illness, possible disability, and, ultimately, old age with financial security.

Challenge to Christians

As we face this vast field of human relations, we are made to realize that, as Christians, we have a tremendous challenge. Our churches and denominational schools must continue to produce men and women of character and integrity who will take with them the ideals of the Christian life into their economic professions, whether they become leaders in the ranks of labor or whether they take their places behind the desks of management.

All of us, through a serious and unprejudiced study of the problem, need to bring ourselves to a thorough understanding of all that is involved in the human relations of industry. The implications are of tremendous significance for both Christianity and our democratic way of life.

of large concentrations of military personnel. Great masses of men living in close proximity to each other, and away from the normal relationships of home and family, living under the restraints so necessary to military life, certainly do not live at their best or even at their near best. "Operation Killer," which is the ultimate goal of military education, can never hope to overcome the very evils inherent in its ultimate aims.

It, therefore, becomes sheer hypocrisy for the Defense Department to talk piously about military training being good for American youth. If they have any arguments in support of UMT, let them confine them solely to military necessity. Parents, educators, and the clergy are best equipped to talk about morals and character education needed for good citizenship. They, rather than the military, have demonstrated that they can, given a reasonable chance at young life, produce these qualities.

ALCOHOLISM—SELF-INDUCED

Dr. Haven Emerson, Professor Emeritus of Public Health Practice at Columbia University, former Commissioner of Health of New York City, and one of the outstanding authorities on alcoholism, stated in an article in the Christian Science Monitor of October 26, 1951:

"In speaking of alcoholism as a sickness, we have been led into a slovenly cutting of corners in language and are deceiving ourselves as to the truth.

"The currently popular theory that alcoholism is simply a sickness and hence that no one is responsible for excessive drinking is misleading and mischievous.

"A great deal of muddled thinking and writing and lack of clear definition has resulted, with frequently unhappy effects.

"This attitude is welcomed by the liquor industries because with it to build on they appear before the public as blameless, claiming merely to 'serve the universal needs of the people,' a few of whom are found to be unfortunate in respect to personality and emotional development and become medical and social problems as chronic alcoholics.

"Misjudgment as to the facts about alcoholism based on the sickness idea has done much harm to the educational campaign to teach people self-restraint, choice, and intelligent abstinence.

"THE CAUSE OF ALCOHOLISM IS, OF COURSE, THE EXCESSIVE AND PERSISTENT DRINKING OF BEVERAGE ALCOHOL. Probably more than half of all alcoholics began their use of alcohol without any physical, mental, or personality deviation from normal.

"This group became abnormal chiefly because of their excessive and in the first place 'moderate' and socially acceptable use of alcohol, which created for them many problems similar in character to those seen in psychoneurotics who make up somewhat less than half of the chronic alcoholics.

"True, an alcoholic, acute or chronic, occasional, continuous, compulsive, habitual, or as a victim of his addiction is a sick person. Alcoholism is a form of intoxication due to the presence of ethyl alcohol in the body.

"The state of alcoholism, a sickness, is self-induced and so different from the common conception of a sickness as not to be properly described as such, but as a SELF-INDUCED POISONING BY A NARCOTIC DRUG."

RISING TIDE OF JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

The Children's Bureau of the Federal Security Agency reported recently that juvenile court cases in 1949 in 413 courts in twenty-two states totaled 70,616. This represents a ratio of about 12 for every 1,000 children in the country between seven and seventeen years of age.

Reports from 218 courts that have been reporting for many years showed that juvenile court cases dropped from a peak of 71,117 in 1945 to 51,994 in 1948 and then rose to 54,028 in 1949. The Children's Bureau said that the preliminary figures for 1950 indicated a continued upward trend.

The claim of the Christian church to transcend the differences between races has always been challenged by Mohammedanism; today the new challenge of our times comes from Communism.—Ernest J. Bingle, London, England.

A MEDIEVAL PRAYER

A librarian in Dagenham, England, is said to have found a copy of a prayer written by a medieval purchaser of land in that district, it reads:

"O Lord, Thou knowest I have mine estates in the City of London and that I likewise lately purchased an estate in fee-simple in the County of Essex. I beseech Thee to preserve the two Counties of Middlesex and Essex from fire and earthquake, and as I have a mortgage in Herefordshire I beg Thee to have an eye of compassion upon that county. For the rest of the counties, Thou mayest deal with them as Thou art pleased."

PEACE (Continued)

2. Do not tolerate complacency about war.

Some of us may ourselves be complacent about war. If not, each of us knows some who are. So each one can do something to reduce the sum total of that complacency. We are witnessing today the shameful spectacle of men in national leadership who are pushing legislation which they know can only be obtained by frightening the American people. Others may feel that they are peculiarly qualified to exercise political leadership and that they can best ride into power on a wave of emotion. Those who influence public opinion may feel that sensationalism is needed to arouse and alert the American people. Those who do such things are following the doctrine that it is possible to get good by doing evil. The fact is that panic started for one purpose seldom stops until it has overshot the chosen mark.

3. Combat a mood of hysteria or blind hatred.

Each of us is aware of focal points of war hysteria and blind hatred. We know perhaps some of the individuals, groups and publications who are spreading that mood. Each, by writing to political leaders or editors, can do something to stop the development of unreasoning mob emotion. Hitlerism was built both upon the myth of racial supremacy and the rabid hatred of a minority people. We must avert the Hitlerian spirit in America.

4. Reject fatalism about war.

Each of us knows some who think that war is inevitable and that it is better to get it over quickly so as to relieve the strain of waiting and to anticipate the Soviet development of atomic power. Each can do something to change that mood of fatalism and impatience.

5. Oppose primary reliance on military strategy to meet Communist aggression.

Each of us has, or can have, influence with leaders in Congress or in the Administration or in political parties and can urge that they do not concentrate on military measures as though these alone would assure peace, but concern themselves also with economic, social, political and moral counter-measures against the threat of war.

In present conditions of international anarchy, where international law and international police power are lacking, national military strength is necessary, while we continually strive for the multilateral reduction and control of armaments through the United Nations. But the main defenses of what we treasure are to be found in non-military measures which will change the conditions favoring the spread of despotism. To provide those defenses is not the task for military advisers. Therefore, the American people, in conformity with the principle of democratic government, should not permit policy making to pass predominantly into the hands of those who think primarily in military terms, as is too much the case today.

6. Press for positive programs which have immediate possibilities for peace and justice.

Each of us can use our voice and our vote in behalf of constructive measures by our government to increase the margin of safety, from war, such as programs for recovery, for increased social welfare, for a covenant on human rights and for a greater support of the United Nations and its many approaches to a better world.

We belong to a free society, and we cherish for ourselves and for others freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom of petition, and freedom to vote. It is such freedoms which are threatened and which we want more fully to achieve and to preserve. Most of us would fight rather than surrender them, even though they might well be lost by fighting. These freedoms can, we are confident, be preserved if they are now used in ways to avert the immediate danger of war. In a free society every citizen has a duty of action.

POLICE AND THE PUBLIC

The key role of the police in Southern race relations has long been recognized. Learned studies by experts have pointed to it again and again. The press, in the South and elsewhere, has documented it in news and editorial columns. The plain people of the region have acknowledged it by turning appraising eyes on the police whenever race is a public issue.

This critical attention, however galling or unjustified it might seem at times to the policemen concerned, is quite understandable. For policemen are symbols. They represent the official conscience of society; they are the custodians of justice at the everyday level, where it is closest to the ordinary person.

So when a society is deeply occupied with a moral problem—in this case, Negro-white relations—policemen assume a bigger-than-life importance. If they perform badly, they do so not just as men wearing uniforms, but as the embodiment of law in their communities. If they perform well, the same thing holds true, except that unfortunately the news value may be less.

In the past, Southern police systems have drawn more blame than praise for their role in race relations. But recently another more hopeful trend has appeared. In town after town over the South a new quality of law enforcement is emerging. Police officers are winning merited acclaim for averting mob violence, safeguarding unpopular prisoners, protecting the innocent, curbing illegal activities of hate groups, and in general enforcing the law impartially and humanely. There are still far too many instances of police violence, forced confessions, and application of a double standard based on race. But such instances are occurring less frequently and are finding less public sanction than ever before.

How quickly this trend will become the normal and accepted pattern of Southern law enforcement depends in large part on public opinion. Police systems do not exist in a vacuum. In fact, they probably reflect more accurately than most of our institutions the temper of the public. When law enforcement is found wanting in fairness or efficiency, thoughtful citizens will ask themselves such questions as these:

Have we created in our community the atmosphere of tolerance and respect for the individual which breeds good law enforcement?

Have we made known to police authorities our interest in sound police practices?

Have we bothered to find out under what conditions our policemen are selected and do their work—qualifications, pay, training, recognition for service?

Have we given as much attention to the problems, shortcomings, and achievements of our police force as we have to those of our schools, churches, civic and welfare agencies?

In a typical community, the answer to each of these questions is likely to be "No." The day-to-day activities of the police—be they good, bad, or indifferent—commonly go unnoticed, uncriticized, unpraised. Only when crisis comes, or when lax or violent police practices erupt into headlines, are local citizens roused from their apathy. The police may well complain that their difficult job is made no easier by this unconstructive public attitude.

In order to help those who are concerned with these problems in their community, the Southern Regional Council has prepared a study booklet entitled, RACE AND LAW ENFORCEMENT. It is a carefully documented survey of the changing trends of modern police practices in the southern regions.

There is a valuable check list by which you, the concerned citizen, can measure the practices of your own community.

The price of the booklet is 15c. Send stamps or coin to this office for your copy.

THE PREVALENCE OF ALCOHOLISM

Speaking at the University of Washington, Seattle, on June 12, 1951, Dr. E. M. Jellinek, formerly Director of the Yale School of Alcohol Studies, and now Chairman of the International Committee on Alcohol Problems of the Mental Health Section of the World Health Organization, stated that there were now in the United States: 3,800,000 alcoholics and, in addition, 3,000,000 problem drinkers. "I would not argue with you if you said there were 7,000,000 alcoholics and problem drinkers in all," said Dr. Jellinek.

OUR HEALTH

". . . Less than 10,000,000 of our 146,000,000,000 people have professional, , full-time health departments to guard their water, milk, and meat supplies from contamnation, to supervise disposal of sewage and garbage, and control communicable diseases."

"Forty million Americans lack the basic protection of full-time health departments. Another 85,000,000 have only the dubious protection of understaffed health departments."

The Churches and SEGREGATION

An Official Statement and Resolution adopted by the General Board of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U. S. A. in Chicago, Illinois, June 11, 1952

The Churches and SEGREGATION*

INTRODUCTION

As Christian disciples work together, their redemptive power in society is heightened. That power is released most transformingly when, in motive and method, it flows directly from the mandates of our Lord. In this statement, the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U. S. A. sets forth some of the clear implications of Christ's command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

I. THE PATTERN OF SEGREGATION

Segregation is the externally imposed separation or division of individual persons or groups, based on race, color or national origin. It is practiced, with some difference of emphasis, in all sections of the country. In many places, segregation is established and supported by law. In others, it is almost as rigidly enforced by social custom and economic practices.

Segregation is an expression of the superiority-inferiority attitudes concerning race, color or national origin held tenaciously by vast numbers of Americans. Segregation is not only the expression of an attitude; it is also the means by which that attitude is transmitted from one generation to another. Children in our society, observing minorities as we segregate them, cannot easily escape the inference that such minorities are inferior.

Moreover, segregation as practiced in the United States probably has more effect on the attitudes of the young than the formal teachings of the schools about democracy or of the churches about Christian brotherhood.

Segregation subjects sections of our population to constant humiliation and forces upon them moral and psychological handicaps in every relation of life. Still more devastating is the moral and spiritual effect upon the majority.

Segregation has meant inferior services to the minority segregated. The theory of "separate but equal" services does not work out in practice; segregation is always discriminatory. Discrimination sets apart those discriminated against so that in effect, they are segregated spiritually and psychologically, if not always physically.

Segregation as applied to our economic system denies to millions of our people free access to the means of making a living and sets for them insurmountable obstacles in their efforts to achieve freedom from want.

At all times and particularly in great crises, segregation makes it impossible to utilize fully large sections of our manpower. It seriously limits the contributions of racial and cultural minority groups to the ongoing life of our people in every aspect of our national existence.

Segregation handicaps our Nation in international relationships. At a time when the United States has come to play a leading role among the nations of the free world, our racial practices which are publicized abroad are made the basis of charges of hypocrisy against the Nation. These charges reverberate throughout the world in a period when the largely submerged non-white groups are becoming self-conscious, striving for recognition of their dignity, for autonomy and equal opportunity. The world community which we are seeking to build must rest on genuine respect for the worth of persons who are created equally the sons of God.

Large numbers of our citizens are being disfranchised and discriminated against as a result of the fears and mutual suspicions engendered by the pattern of segregation. These cause unnecessary confusion in dealing with important public issues, create unreal political divisions and give rise to a type of political appeal that threatens our democracy and democratic institutions.

Segregation increases and accentuates racial tension. It is worth noting that race riots in this country have seldom occurred in neighborhoods with a racially mixed population. Our worst riots have broken out along the edges of and in rigidly segregated areas.

Above all, the principle of segregation is a denial of the Christian faith and ethic which stems from the basic premise taught by our Lord that all men are created the children of God. The pattern of segregation is diametrically opposed to what Christians believe about the worth of persons and if we are to be true to the Christian faith we must take our stand against it.

II. THE CHURCHES AND THE PATTERN OF SEGREGATION

The pattern of segregation in the United States is given moral sanction by the fact that churches and church institutions, as a result of insensitiveness and social pressure, have so largely accepted this pattern in their own life and practice.

A. Segregation in Church Practice

While the pattern of segregation is too common in our public education at all levels, it is even more general in the churches in worship and fellowship. There are large areas of the public education field where racial separation is not practiced and only a relatively few churches which are racially inclusive in practice.* Furthermore, the pattern of segregation in public education appears to be changing more rapidly than in the churches.

While there are some exceptions among the communions and in certain interdenominational agencies, notably councils of churches, nevertheless, religious bodies are generally divided on a racial basis, in national organizations, in regional bodies and in local congregations. The acceptance by the churches of this pattern of segregation is so prevalent that fellowship between white and nonwhite Christians in the United States is frequently awkward and unsatisfactory.

It should be noted, however, that the communions have expressed an increasing concern for the elimination of segregation from the churches and society. Since the statement titled "The Church and Race Relations" was adopted by the Federal Council of Churches in 1946, the national bodies of twenty communions have issued statements that sanction the practice of an inclusive ministry to all people without regard to race, color or national origin. Nine of these national church bodies have renounced the pattern of segregation both in their own fellowship and in society; two have placed emphasis on the elimination of discrimination; and nine have indicated their concern for justice and opportunity for all people. In addition to defining denominational policy, these statements have served as a basis for launching denominawithout association in work and worship with Christians of other races except in interdenominational organizations which involve a few of their leaders. The remaining 500,000 Negro Protestants, about 10%, are in denominations predominantly white. Of these about 95%, judging by the surveys of six denominations, are in segregated congregations and are in association with their white denominational brothers only in national assemblies, and, in some denominations, in regional, state or more local jurisdictional meetings. The remaining 5% of the 10% in white denominations are members of local churches which are predominantly white. Thus only one-half of one per cent of the Negro Protestant Christians of the United States worship regularly in churches with fellow Christians of another race. This typical pattern occurs, furthermore, for the most part in communities where there are only a few Negro families and where, therefore, there are only on an average two or three Negro individuals in the white churches." (Racial Policies and Practices of Major Protestant Denominations, by Frank Loescher — Re-tional programs for the improvement of racial and cultural relations.

While members of racial groups other than the one to which a majority of the congregation belongs are not absolutely barred by a rule from attendance, in many local churches the self-consciousness which their presence arouses bars them from freedom to worship in fellowship, and even from the initial contact.

At the level of the local church there are some encouraging examples of pastors, church officers and congregations who have come to grips with the dilemma of the segregated church. There are congregations and especially Sunday church schools and vacation church schools which are racially inclusive, and there are other church groups in the process of becoming so. These efforts need to be more widely known and the methods employed shared more fully with others.

A church located in a community in which the population is changing has a responsibility to serve the people of that community without regard to race, color or national origin. National and regional denominational bodies as well as councils of churches should encourage local congregations to consider this responsibility and cooperate with them in achieving this type of service.

However, the local church faces the difficult, although not insurmountable, obstacle of segre-

The statistical table found on page 68, "The Protestant Church and the Negro," by Frank Loescher, published in 1948, indicates that 860 churches out of 17,900 to whom questionnaires were sent, reported Negro participation in predominantly white churches. This indicates that 4.8% of the churches in six communions reported Negro participation.

In a cooperative study of 13,597 churches, 1331 predominantly white churches in three communions reported membership or attendance by persons of one or more racial minority groups. This indicates that 9.8% of the total number of churches in three communions are racially inclusive in membership or attendance. (1952) (See article titled "Protestant Churches—Are They Racially Inclusive?" by Alfred S. Kramer, in THE CITY CHURCH, Volume III, Number 2, March, 1952.)

gated housing in both the city and the suburbs. When a church is located in a community where segregated housing limits the population to one racial or cultural group, the people whom the church serves will tend to be limited to that racial or cultural group. Churches and councils of churches should, therefore, take definite steps to help create unsegregated residential communities where normal day-to-day relationships will develop among people of all races, colors, creeds and national origins.

B. Racial Practices in Church Hospitals Similar to those in Non-Church Hospitals

The racial practices of hospitals controlled by or affiliated with communions are little different from such practices in other hospitals. Negro nurses, doctors and patients are excluded from many church hospitals just as they are from similar institutions secularly controlled. To some degree this exclusion applies to other minority racial and cultural groups. The correction of this situation is complicated by the fact that in many instances these church hospitals have lost their close organic connection with the communions and have come more and more to accept the standards of the secular community. Some are private institutions no longer connected with the church even though their religious or denominational names still imply such a connection. However, a number still maintain a more or less definite relationship with the communions.

C. Segregation in Church-Related Educational Institutions

Church-related educational institutions established for constituencies predominantly white are somewhat less segregated than hospitals. There are church-related schools at all educational levels which have always maintained the practice of admitting students without regard to race, color, creed or national origin and there are others which have adopted this practice. Nevertheless, there are still large numbers of our church schools which would no more depart from the practice of exclusion than would secular institutions under similar circumstances. Some of these schools resort to devices to avoid accepting qualified Negro, Jewish or Oriental students. Even after admission, some schools fail to fulfill the obligation of completely integrating members of minority racial and cultural groups into the life of the institution.

D. Theological Institutions Frequently Practice Exclusion

The changes which have been made recently by a number of theological seminaries in their policies and practices so as to admit students without regard to race, color or national origin, are commendable. However, there are still others which practice exclusion on the basis of race, color or national origin. In view of this, it is not strange that large numbers of our white ministers are uncertain and lack concern about race relations. On the other hand, ministers who are members of minority groups frequently doubt the sincerity of their brethren of the majority group. Fellowship among ministers in this country is frequently strained and unsatisfactory. It will continue to be so as long as we practice segregation to any extent in ministerial training. Association among persons of different racial groups, in their training, should be a vital part of the education of ministers.

E. The Churches and Employment Practices

The employment of ministers in a segregated pattern continues the strained and unsatisfactory fellowship which often exists in the theological institutions. With few exceptions, ministers who are members of racial and cultural minority groups must serve congregations which are composed of members of their own groups. This system of employment tends to perpetuate the segregated local church. Ministers should be called or appointed to churches primarily on the basis of character, ability and qualifications set up by the communion or local church, rather than on the basis of race, color or national origin.

Moreover, it is not customary for state, area or national denominational and interdenominational boards and agencies to employ members of minority racial and cultural groups as professional or executive staff for service at home and abroad. The exception to this is occasional employment in work involving either their own particular group or race relations. It is noted with satisfaction that the communions and the interdenominational agencies now employ persons rather generally in secretarial and clerical positions on the basis of character and ability, without regard to race, color or national origin. What has been accomplished in this regard should be adopted as a pattern in the employment of professional or executive staff. The Christian witness of the churches which calls for fair employment practices in the community, state and Nation is immeasurably strengthened by a demonstration of fair employment practices in the life and work of the churches.

F. The Responsibility of the Churches to Eliminate Segregation

Christians in the United States, more than ever before, honestly desire that quality of Christian fellowship which brings to the total Church the gifts of all for the spiritual enrichment of each. Efforts directed toward such spiritual enrichment are frequently confused and ineffectual because of the pattern of segregation which defeats goodwill. Many persons find themselves frustrated when they attempt to live out their Christian impulses within a racially segregated society.

The Church, when true to its higher destiny, has always understood that its gospel of good news has a two-fold function, namely:

> To create new men with new motives;
>
> To create a new society wherein such men will find a favorable environment within which to live their Christian convictions.

The churches in the United States, while earnestly striving to nurture and develop individuals of goodwill, have not dealt adequately with the fundamental pattern of segregation in our society which thwarts their efforts. This must be corrected. The churches should continue to emphasize the first function. In addition, they must launch a more comprehensive program of action in fulfillment of the second function. This is imperative now.

III. THE NATIONAL COUNCIL AND SEGREGATION

The communions and the interdenominational agencies have faced this question and taken action on it. A number of the interdenominational agencies which merged to form the National Council of Churches had renounced the pattern of segregation based on race, color or national origin as unnecessary and undesirable and a violation of basic Christian principles. A number of the communions have adopted the 1946 statement of the Federal Council of Churches and others have adopted statements of their own on this question.

The National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. in its organizational structure and operation, renounces and earnestly recommends to its member churches that they renounce the pattern of segregation based on race, color or national origin as unnecessary and undesirable and a violation of the Gospel of love and human brotherhood. While recognizing that historical and social factors make it more difficult for some churches than for others to realize the Christian ideal of non-segregation, the Council urges all of its constituent members to work steadily and progressively towards a non-segregated church as the goal which is set forth in the faith and practice of the early Christian community and inherent in the New Testament idea of the Church of Christ. As proof of our sincerity in this renunciation, the National Council of Churches will work for a non-segregated church and a non-segregated community.

IV. THE CHURCHES SHOULD ASCERTAIN THE FACTS ABOUT THEIR OWN PRACTICES

We urge that in studying their own practices, the churches use the following statement of principles as a standard of measurement:

A. Membership

All persons who accept Christ as Lord and Master and the doctrinal standards of the communion ought to be invited and welcomed into membership of our communion's parish churches.

B. Fellowship

Christian fellowship means that all who accept Christ as Lord and Master are united by bonds of brotherhood which transcend race, color or national origin.

C. Worship

Worship opportunities inclusive of all groups ought to be available both regularly and frequently, so as to make such worship a normal expression of our common worship of God without self-consciousness or embarrassment.

D. Outreach of the Minister

The outreach of the minister should be inclusive. This means that his services ought to be available to persons of all groups in the community without discrimination.

E. Educational and Welfare Services

Church-related schools, colleges, hospitals, homes for children and the aged and other institutions have a responsibility to serve persons who are members of their communion without regard to race, color or national origin.

Church camps, conferences and projects conducted for the purpose of training persons for leadership or participation in the program and activities of the churches have a responsibility to serve the churches and their members without regard to race, color or national origin.

F. Employment

Christian churches demonstrate belief in the essential worth of persons because they are the children of God when they provide full opportunities for the employment at all levels and on the same basis of character and ability, of all persons found in the membership of their communion, including those from racial and cultural minorities.

V. THE CHURCHES SHOULD ELIMINATE SEGREGATION FROM THEIR OWN PRACTICES

If the churches would remove the validity of the charge implied by the world when it says "Physician, heal thyself," they should act promptly and decisively to eliminate segregation from their own practices, taking steps to formulate plans of action based on answers to the following essential questions:

A. Membership

How many churches are there in our communion in which people are not welcome to membership because of race, color or national origin? What actions are necessary to correct this situation?

B. Fellowship

Does racial segregation or exclusion create a chasm which places profound limitations upon Christian fellowship within the life of a geographical community? If so, what should be done to remove these limitations?

C. Worship

What is the extent of racial segregation or exclusion in the services of worship provided by our communion? What steps are necessary to correct this situation?

D. Outreach of the Minister

Is the outreach of the minister inclusive of all people? Are his services available to persons of all groups in the community?

E. Educational and Welfare Services

What is the extent of racial segregation or exclusion in the practices of schools, colleges, seminaries, hospitals, homes, camps, young people's conferences and similar institutions affiliated with our communion? What are the steps that should now be authorized and carried out by the responsible boards of the communion to rectify these practices?

F. Employment

Do the local, state and area organizations, national boards and general ecclesiastical offices of our communion provide opportunities for employment on the basis of character and ability without regard to race, color or national origin? If not, what administrative procedures should be proposed within our communion to bring employment practices within its entire life into conformity with the ideals of a "non-segregated church and a non-segregated community?"

VI. THE CHURCHES SHOULD HELP TO RELIEVE COMMUNITY TENSIONS

Churches, having chosen to renounce the pattern of segregation as a violation of the Gospel of love which is committed unto them, and having outlined steps by which that pattern shall be eliminated from their own practices, should at the same time direct their attention to the community, at the national, state and local levels.

In order that the community may sense the transforming power of organized religion in relieving community tensions arising from the pattern of segregation, the churches should assume responsibility for dealing with such questions as discrimination in employment, housing, education, health and leisure-time activities. We should cooperate with other organizations in the formulation and execution of a community-wide plan of action to eliminate patterns of segregation and to change the policies and practices that create tensions.

OUR HOPE AND STRENGTH

We thank God, especially in a time when so many men are estranged from Him and from one another, that He has created us "of one blood" and through Christ has brought Christians into one family. It was by God's power that Christ's disciples lived and worked in love. This faith that Christians are "one body in Christ," commits us inevitably to the task of transcending barriers of race, color and nationality in our churches and in our communities until we may, by His Grace, one day demonstrate our faith that "we are members one of another."

BUILDING THE PEACE

The United Nations

Dumbarton Oaks Proposals for a General International Organization

To be the subject of

THE UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE at San Francisco, April 25, 1945

THERE SHOULD be established an international organization under the title of The United Nations, the Charter of which should contain provisions necessary to give effect to the proposals which follow.

Chapter I. Purposes

The purposes of the Organization should be:

1. To maintain international peace and security; and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means adjustment or settlement of international disputes which may lead to a breach of the peace;

2. To develop friendly relations among nations and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;

3. To achieve international cooperation in the solution of international economic, social and other humanitarian problems; and

4. To afford a center for harmonizing the actions of nations in the achievement of these common ends.

Chapter II. Principles

In pursuit of the purposes mentioned in Chapter I the Organization and its members should act in accordance with the following principles:

1. The Organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states.

2. All members of the Organization undertake, in order to ensure to all of them the rights and benefits resulting from membership in the Organization, to fulfill the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the Charter.

3. All members of the Organization shall settle their disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security are not endangered.

4. All members of the Organization shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the Organization.

5. All members of the Organization shall give every assistance to the Organization in any action undertaken by it in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

6. All members of the Organization shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which preventive or enforcement action is being undertaken by the Organization.

The Organization should ensure that states not members of the Organization act in accordance with these principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Chapter III. Membership

1. Membership of the Organization should be open to all peace-loving states.

SING A SONG OF FRIENDSHIP

The ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH and the AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE are proud to reproduce these musical messages of international good-will. We believe that these songs from Irving Caesar's new book Sing a Song of Friendship will sing themselves into the hearts of people the world 'round, building peace and brotherhood.

We are indebted to LOOK Magazine for permitting us to reprint this feature from their issue of Oct. 1, 1946.

Songs for the United Nations

The United Nations' Assembly will soon meet again in New York for a six weeks' session. During that period, Irving Caesar (see page 8) will publish a book of new purposeful songs entitled: Sing A Song of Friendship. His nineteen songs range in subject matter from racial intolerance to a musical plea that we make the world of tomorrow, today! Caesar's work was inspired by the United Nations. LOOK presents five of the songs that represent that organization's purpose as stated in the preamble to its Charter . . . a plea for human rights.

From the preamble of the United Nations' charter:

We the peoples of the United Nations determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind . . .

The song: This Is Our Last Chance for Peace

We must try forever to remember,
September second nineteen forty-five,
It was on the second of September,
We knew at last our freedom would survive;

The Japanese who fought with might and fury,
Surrendered to the brave and true Allies,

They came aboard our battleship Missouri,
And signed before our gen'rals' very eyes—

And then while hearts were filled with jubilation,
By radio a gen'ral told the nation—
Refrain:
People of America, people ev'rywhere,

The miracles of science never cease,
Submarines and radar and bombers in the air,
This is our last chance for peace!

Learn a lesson from
The atomic bomb
That mighty nations fear,
People, I implore,
Put an end to war,
Or our world will disappear,

People of America, people of the world—
From now on may our happiness increase,
Learn in God to trust,
Or return to dust,
This is our last chance for peace!

From the preamble of the United Nations' charter:

To reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small . . .

The song: It Is Always Music to His Ear

You may pray on Saturday or Sunday,
It is always music to His ear,
Though you pray on seven days or one day,
He is ever close enough to hear;
Pray in a cathedral, in a synagogue or church,
A temple, mosque, or tabernacle—
He won't need to search,
Pray in any language, to Him they all are dear,
Pray, for it is music to His ear,
It is lovely music to His ear!

From the preamble of the United Nations' charter:

To promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom, and for these ends to practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbors, and . . .

The song: Thomas Jefferski

I have a little friend whose name ends with a "ski"
And yet my little friend looks just like you and me;
Last night I asked my father why a name like that should be,
And this is what my father said
as I sat on his knee—
Refrain:
A "ski" a "witz" or "off" or "cu" when added to a name,
Just teaches us the family or town from which it came,
A name like Thomas Jefferson in some lands
o'er the sea,
Would not be Thomas Jefferson but
Thomas Jefferski;
Or "Jefferwitz" or "Jefferoff" or maybe
"Jeffercu"—
So do not let a "ski" or "off" or "witz" seem strange to you,
I feel the same towards ev'ry name no matter how it ends,
For people with the strangest names can be the best of friends!

From the preamble of the United Nations' charter:

To unite our strength to maintain international peace and security and . . . to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples . . .

The song: Election Day

Election day, election day,
The best day of the year,
We prize it in the U. S. A.
Where freedom is so dear,
Poor man, rich man, doctor, teacher,
Worker, farmer, lawyer, preacher,
By our votes can be elected,
Or defeated and rejected;
"Vote for me"—plead Smith and Jones and Brown,
So you see, the voter wears the crown,
Though Smith may win, and Brown may lose,
Still when we've had our say,
We're loyal to the one we choose,
Till next election day!

From the preamble of the United Nations' charter:

Have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims. Accordingly our respective Governments . . . have agreed to the present Charter of the United Nations and do hereby establish an international organization to be known as the United Nations.

The song: Fifty Friendly Nations

Fifty nations met in San Francisco,
Brought together by a single dream,
Nations small and great,
They said, "We'll rid the world of hate,
Provided we keep working like a team;"

Just imagine fifty friendly nations,
Dreaming, planning, working with a will,
They said, "We'll unite,
And with our might protect the right, and peace alone is right—it's wrong to kill;"
Fifty nations made a solemn promise,
Ev'rywhere all people shall be freed,
Ev'ry life protected, ev'ry right respected,
Ev'ry language, race and creed;
"Youth" they said, "No more must play the martyr,
Sacrificed in battle through the years,"
So proclaimed the San Francisco charter,
When fifty nations signed away their fear!

Popular songwriter Irving Caesar now writes of international goodwill

Irving Caesar

His newest work tells hope of mankind in song

LOOK LISTEN

Irving Caesar writes lyrics America sings. His list of perennial song hits contains Tea for Two, Swanee and Just a Gigolo.

Now he wants a world to sing the 19 purposeful songs he is publishing this month in a book entitled, Sing a Song of Friendship (see page 3).

Energetic, unmarried Irving Caesar was born 51 years ago on New York's east side. At the age of 5 he managed a one-fingered rendition of One Sunday Afternoon. When he was 9, Caesar wrote a school song that inspired the basketball five to a championship. During World War I, he accompanied Henry Ford's Peace Ship which went with a cargo of good intentions to stop the spreading war. Caesar contributed propaganda songs designed to have the battling soldiers sing their way to peace. The venture was ill-fated but Caesar had found his life work. His professional career was successfully started after he got an idea for a song that he and the late George Gershwin finished in 30 minutes. The song was Swanee. In 1938 he did his famous group, Sing a Song of Safety. Millions of children have since been tunefully admonished:

"An automobile has two big eyes, to see where it is going.
And if you don't use your own two eyes, its horn will start blowing."

With his new group, Sing a Song of Friendship, he is making the musical plea: Let's Make the World of Tomorrow Today!

RULES OF PROCEDURE

FOR THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

(United Nations Document No. E/33/Rev. 3, 15 March 1947)

I. SESSIONS

Rule 1

The Economic and Social Council shall hold at least three sessions a year. One of these sessions shall be held shortly before the opening of the regular session of the General Assembly.

Rule 2

Sessions shall be held at a date fixed by the Council at a previous meeting.

Rule 3

A session of the Council shall also be held within thirty days of the request thereof:

(a) by a majority of its members;

(b) by the General Assembly; or

(c) by the Security Council, acting in pursuance of Article 41 of the Charter.

Rule 4

A session of the Council shall also be held if the Security Council, the Trusteeship Council, or any Member of the United Nations, or a specialized agency* requests a session and the President of the Council agrees to the request. If the President does not agree, he shall, within four days of the receipt of the request, inform the other members of the Council of the request and of his refusal and shall at the same time enquire whether or not they support the request for a session. If, within eight days of this enquiry, a majority of the members of the Council explicitly concurs in the request, the President shall summon the Council to meet within the next fifteen days.

* When the term "specialized agency" is used in these rules, it refers to specialized agencies brought into relationship with the United Nations.

Rule 5

The President of the Council, with the concurrence of the Vice-Presidents, may also call a session of the Council and fix the date thereof.

Rule 6

Each session shall be held at the seat of the United Nations unless in pursuance of a previous decision of the Council or at the request of a majority of its members another place is designated

Rule 7

The President of the Council shall notify the members, through the Secretary-General, of the date of the first meeting of each session. Such notification shall be sent:

(a) at least eight days in advance, when a session is called upon the request of the Security Council acting in pursuance of Article 41 of the Charter;

(b) at least twelve days in advance in cases referred to under Rule 4; and

(c) at least twenty-one days in advance in all other cases.

Rule 8

The Council may decide at any session to adjourn temporarily and resume its meetings at a later date.

II. AGENDA

Rule 9

The provisional agenda for each session shall be drawn up by the Secretary-General in consultation with the President, and shall be communicated to the members of the Council, all other Members of the United Nations, to the specialized agencies and to the non-governmental organizations in Category A*, together with the notice convening the Council.

* That is, a non-governmental organization recognized in accordance with Paragraph 1 (a) of Part IV of the Report of the Committee on Arrangements for Consultation with Non-Governmental Organizations adopted by the Council on 21 June 1946.

Rule 10

Rule 10

The provisional agenda shall include:

(a) all items proposed by the Council at a previous meeting;

(b) all items proposed by any Member of the United Nations;

(c) all items proposed by the General Assembly, the Security Council, the Trusteeship Council, a specialized agency or a non-governmental organization in Category A.

Rule 11

Before the Secretary-General places an item proposed by a specialized agency or a non-governmental organization of the type referred to in Rule 10 upon the provisional agenda, he shall carry out with the agency or organization concerned such preliminary consultation as may be necessary.

Rule 12

The first item on the provisional agenda of any session of the Council shall be the adoption of the agenda.

Rule 13

The Council shall set up an Agenda Committee composed of the President, the two Vice-Presidents and two other members who shall be elected at each session of the Council to hold office until replaced at the next session. The President shall be the chairman of the Agenda Committee.

Rule 14

The Agenda Committee shall prior to each session consider the provisional agenda and make recommendations thereon to the Council at the first meeting of the session, including suggestions as to the inclusion or deferment of items and the order in which they shall be considered. A Member of the United Nations, a specialized agency or a non-governmental organization in Category A, which has requested the inclusion of an item in the provisional agenda, shall be entitled to present its views through its representative at any meeting of the Agenda Committee at which the question of the inclusion of the item is discussed.

Rule 15

The Council may revise the agenda. If the session has been summoned in accordance with Rules 3, 4 and 5, priority shall be given to those items which have occasioned the session.

III. REPRESENTATIVES, ADVISERS AND CREDENTIALS

Rule 16

Each representative on the Council may be accompanied by such alternate representatives and technical advisers as he may require.

Rule 17

The credentials of representatives, and the names of alternate representatives, shall be submitted to the Secretary-General, and the President and the Vice-Presidents shall examine them and submit their report to the Council.

IV. PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENTS

Rule 18

The Council shall elect a President, a first Vice-President, and a second Vice-President, from among the representatives of its members.

Rule 19

The President and Vice-Presidents shall hold office until their successors are elected at the first meeting of the Council on or after the first of January in each year and shall be eligible for re-election.

Rule 20

If the President is absent from a meeting or any part thereof, the first Vice-President, or in the latter's absence, the second Vice-President shall preside.

Rule 21

If the President ceases to be a representative of a member of the Council or is incapacitated, the first Vice-President shall serve for the unexpired term. If the first Vice-President ceases to be a representative of a member of the Council or is incapacitated, the second Vice-President shall take his place.

Rule 22

Rule 22

A Vice-President acting as President shall have the same powers and duties as the President.

Rule 23

In the case of a Member of the Council which is for the time being represented by the President, an alternate delegate shall at the discretion of the President be permitted to participate in the proceedings and to vote in the Council. In such a case the President should not exercise his right to vote.

V. COMMITTEES OF THE COUNCIL

Rule 24

At each session, the Council may set up such committees as it deems necessary and refer to them any questions on the agenda for study and report. Such committees, composed of members of the Council, may be authorized to six while the Council is not in session.

VI. SECRETARIAT

Rule 25

The Secretary-General shall act in that capacity in all meetings of the Council. He may authorize a deputy to act in his place at meetings of the Council.

Rule 26

The Secretary-General shall provide and direct the staff required by the Council, its committees and such subsidiary bodies as may be established by it.

Rule 27

The Secretary-General shall be responsible for keeping the members of the Council informed of any questions which may be brought before it for consideration.

Rule 28

The Secretary-General or his deputy may at any time, upon the invitation of the President of the Council or of the Chairmen of committees of the Council and subsidiary bodies, make either oral or written statements concerning any question under consideration.

Rule 29

Rule 29

The Secretary-General shall be responsible for all the necessary arrangements for meetings of the Council.

Rule 30

Before any proposal which involves expenditure from United Nations funds is approved by the Council the Secretary-General shall prepare and circulate to members (a) a summary report of the financial implications of the proposals; and (b) estimates of costs involved in each proposal.

VII. LANGUAGES

Rule 31

Chinese, English, French, Russian and Spanish shall be the official languages, and English and French the working languages of the Council.

Rule 32

Speeches made in either of the working languages shall be interpreted into the other working language.

Rule 33

Speeches made in any other of the three official languages shall be interpreted into both working languages.

Rule 34

Any representative may make a speech in a language other than the official languages. In this case he shall himself provide for interpretation into one of the working languages. Interpretation into the other working language by an interpreter of the Secretariat may be based on the interpretation given in the first working language.

Rule 35

Verbatim records shall be drawn up in the working languages. A translation of the whole or part of any verbatim record into any of the other official languages shall be furnished if requested by any delegation.

Rule 36

Rule 36

Summary records shall be drawn up in the working languages. A translation of the whole or part of any summary record into any of the other official languages shall be furnished if requested by any delegation.

Rule 37

The Journal of the Council shall be issued in the working languages.

Rule 38

All resolutions, recommendations and other formal decisions of the Council shall be made available in the official languages.

VIII. VOTING

Rule 39

Each member of the Council shall have one vote.

Rule 40

Decisions of the Council shall be made by a majority of the members present and voting.

Rule 41

The Council shall normally vote by show of hands except that any representative may request a roll call which shall then be taken in the English alphabetical order of the names of the members.

Rule 42

The vote of each member participating in any roll call shall be inserted in the record.

Rule 43

On decisions relating to individuals, a secret ballot shall be taken.

Rule 44

If, when one person or member only is to be elected, no candidate obtains in the first ballot the majority required, a second ballot shall be taken, confined to the two candidates obtaining the largest number of votes. If in the second ballot the votes are equally divided, the President shall decide between the candidates by drawing lots.

Rule 45

Rule 45

When two or more elective places are to be filled at one time under the same conditions, those candidates obtaining in the first ballot the majority required shall be elected. If the number of candidates obtaining such a majority is less than the number of persons or members to be elected, there shall be additional ballots to fill the remaining places, the voting being restricted to the candidates obtaining the greatest number of votes in the first place, the number of candidates being not more than twice as many as the places remaining to be filled.

Rule 46

If a vote is equally divided on matters other than elections, a second vote shall be taken at the next meeting. If this vote also results in equality, the proposal shall be regarded as rejected.

IX. PUBLICITY OF MEETING

Rule 47

The meetings of the Council shall be held in public unless the Council decides otherwise.

Rule 48

At the close of each private meeting, the Council may issue a communique through the Secretary-General.

X. RECORDS

Rule 49

Summary records of the meetings of the Council, its committees and subsidiary bodies shall be kept by the Secretariat. They shall be sent as soon as possible to all members participating in the meeting who shall inform the Secretariat not later than twenty-four hours after the circulation of the summary record, of any changes they wish to have made. Summary records of public meetings shall be sent as soon as possible after the close of the session to all Members of the United Nations and to the specialized agencies.

Rule 50

Verbatim records of the meetings of the Council shall be kept by the Secretariat. The verbatim records of public meetings shall be available to the public. The verbatim records of private meetings shall be available, when the Council so decides, to representatives

representatives of the Members of the United Nations only.

Rule 51

As soon as possible the text of all resolutions, recommendations and other formal decisions adopted by the Council, its committees and subsidiary bodies, shall be communicated by the Secretary-General to the members of the Council, and as soon as possible after the end of the session, to all Members of the United Nations and to the specialized agencies.

Rule 52

The summary records and relevant documents of private meetings of the Council, its committees and subsidiary bodies, shall be distributed to the Members of the United Nations if the Council so decides.

XI. CONDUCT OF BUSINESS

Rule 53

A majority of the members of the Council shall constitute a quorum.

Rule 54

In addition to exercising the powers conferred upon him elsewhere by these rules, the President shall declare the opening and closing of each meeting of the Council, shall direct the discussion, ensure the observance of these rules, and shall accord the right to speak, put questions, and announce decisions.

Rule 55

During the discussion of any matter, a representative may rise to a point of order, and the point of order shall be immediately decided by the President in accordance with the Rules of Procedure.

Rule 56

During the discussion of any matter, a representative may move the adjournment of the debate. Any such motion shall have priority in the debate. In addition to the proposer of the motion, one representative may speak in favour of and one against the motion.

Rule 57

The Council may limit the time allowed to each speaker.

Rule 58

A representative may at any time move the closure of the debate whether or not any other representative has signified his wish to speak. If application is made for permission to speak against the closure it may be accorded to not more than two speakers.

Rule 59

The President shall take the sense of the Council on a motion for closure. If the Council is in favour of the closure the President shall declare the closure of the debate.

Rule 60

Resolutions, amendments and substantive motions shall be introduced in writing and handed to the Secretary-General, who shall circulate copies to the representatives twenty-four hours in advance, unless the Council decides otherwise.

Rule 61

Parts of a proposal may be voted on separately if a representative requests that the proposal be divided.

Rule 62

If two or more amendments are moved to a proposal the Council shall first vote on the amendment furthest removed in substance from the original proposal and then on the amendment next furthest removed and so on until all the amendments have been put to the vote.

Rule 63

When an amendment revises, adds to or deletes from, a proposal, the amendment shall be voted on first, and if it is adopted, the amended proposal shall then be voted on.

XII. COMMISSIONS

Rule 64

The Council shall set up such commissions as may be required for the performance of its functions, and shall define the powers and composition of each of them. The Council may authorize commission to set up subsidiary bodies.

Rule 65

Unless otherwise decided by the Council, each commission shall elect its own officers and adopt its own rules of procedure.

Rule 66

The Rules of Procedure of the Council shall apply to the proceedings of commissions and subsidiary bodies until they adopt their own rules of procedure.

Rule 67

When the report of a commission is under consideration, the Council shall invite the chairman of the commission, or a person designated by him, to participate without vote in the discussion on the report.

XIII. AMENDMENTS AND SUSPENSIONS

Rule 68

Any of these rules may be amended or suspended by the Council, provided the proposed amendments or suspensions are consistent with the Charter.

Rule 69

These rules may not be amended until the Council has received a report on the proposed amendment from a committee of the Council.

Rule 70

A rule of procedure may be suspended by the Council provided that twenty-four hours' notice of the proposal for the suspension has been given. The notice may be waived if no member objects.

The United Nations and Non-Self-Governing Territories

THERE are roughly 300 million inhabitants of colonial countries throughout the world. These people have no direct representation or voice in the United Nations. Openly in revolt in many areas and everywhere impatient of the slow progress toward self-government, these people will be anxiously watching the current session of the United Nations General Assembly.

For at the present meeting the members of the United Nations will have before them for the first time reports regarding the conditions of the people in the majority of the colonies, submitted by the governing powers in accordance with Article 73(e) of the Charter. After considering these reports, the delegates will be called upon to decide what specific measures the United Nations should and will take toward promoting the well-being and self-government of the colonial peoples, the the objective stated in Article 73 to be "a sacred trust" accepted by all the member states.

So far as the special category of colonies known as trusteeship territories is concerned, the Assembly will be called upon to review and approve the work of Trusteeship Council which held its first meeting earlier this year (see June issue of New Africa).

There are at present only 9 trusteeship territories including the Pacific Islands under the U.S.—whereas there are 74 other areas which have been designated "non-self-governing territories" (the term itself has never been defined) thus coming within the scope of Article 73. Of these the United Kingdom has 43, France 16 (four of which were taken off the list this year), the United States 7, Netherlands 3, New Zealand 2, and Belgium, Australia and Denmark one each.

At the tremendous overflow rally in New York on September 11, called by the Progressive Citizens of America, the demand that the American government adopt a democratic policy in both domestic and foreign affairs was voiced by Dr. Kingdon, Henry Wallace, Lena Horne and Paul Robeson, shown here (l. to r.) chatting together during the meeting.

Last year's General Assembly meeting, despite the opposition of the colonial powers, voted to establish a special committee to examine the information submitted concerning the non-self-governing territories, with a view to aiding the General Assembly in its consideration of the information and in determining how best to utilize it. This decision represented a victory for those delegates who argued that the information reports should not be merely "filed and forgotten," but should serve as the basis for constructive U.N. action on behalf of the colonial millions.

The Preliminary Skirmish

The special committee met at Lake Success from August 28 to September 12 and prepared its report for the Assembly. The committee was composed of the colony-holding powers mentioned above and an equal number of non-colonial states elected by the General Assembly—Brazil, China, Cuba, Egypt, India, Philippines, the Soviet Union, and Uruguay.

Sharp differences of opinion arose between the representatives of the colonial powers and the elected delegates over the character of the information reports submitted and questions of future procedure. On some of these points of difference, however, the representatives of Brazil, China, Cuba and Uruguay either abstained or voted with the colony-holding powers.

Information reports were available for only 57 of the 74 non-self-governing territories and these reports varied markedly in form and substance. The Soviet delegate, Jacob Lamokin, called the attention of the committee to the general absence of information on such matters as the relative living standards of the indigenous and non-indigenous inhabitants of the colonies, electoral procedures, civil rights, discrimination, land tenure, corporal punishment, and tax and tariff structures.

Notwithstanding the excuses given by the representatives of the colonial powers for the incompleteness of data submitted, the committee was compelled to draw the conclusion that the "information transmitted up to this date does not draw a sufficiently clear picture of the living conditions of the peoples of the non-self-governing territories." Proposals were made for securing the submission of more uniform and complete reports in the future.

Disagreement on Political Information

At the first meeting of the committee the Philippine delegate, General Romulo, and the Soviet delegate criticized the failure of the colonial powers to give adequate information regarding the participation of peoples in the colonies in local self-government and their general political progress, and the failure to include this item in the agenda of the committee along with matters of education, health, labor and economic conditions. It was noted that the United Kingdom reports were completely void of such political information, whereas the United States reports had included such political data.

This same question arose again and again during the subsequent meeting of the committee. Representatives of the colonial powers insisted upon adherence to the literal wording of Article 73 (e) which calls for the submission of "statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to social, economic and educational conditions" in the non-self-governing territories. The Soviet, Indian, Egyptian and Chinese delegates, on the other hand, argued that Article 73 as a whole clearly implied that information on political progress was required and that, further, it was impossible to separate political factors from educational, economic and social conditions.

The committee finally voted that the transmission of political information should be regarded as optional but that it should be "duly noted and encouraged" by the General Assembly.

The strongest proposals with regard to this question and other functions of the U.N. in relation to non-self-governing territories were advanced by the Soviet representative. He recommended that a special questionnaire be prepared by the Secretary General following consultation with members of the committee in order to secure "fuller and more accurate information;" that the administering authorities should give "detailed data on the participation of the populations in the local organs of the administration;" that the Secretary General should transmit summaries of information from unoffical organizations and individual in the colonies together with the official governmental information; that U.N. representatives should make yearly on-the-spot-examinations of conditions in the colonies; and that the committee should examine petitions from local populations of the colonies, together with official information submitted.

None of these proposal secured the support of the majority of the committee, although in at least one instance the vote was as close as 5 to 6.

Criticism of Colonial Conditions

It fell to the Indian delegate, Dr. P. Pillai, and the Soviet delegate, Mr. Lamokin, to provide the committee with detailed information on such colonial matters as discrimination in educational expenditures and facilities and the inadequacy of educational service in Kenya and other territories; discrimination in wages; the deterioration of health because of malnutrition and other factors; discrimination in immigration regulations in East African colonies; the evils of labor migration; and the expropriation of land and resources in colonies by foreign monopolies.

Authorities such as Lord Hailey and various official documents were cited in substantiation of these charges. The Egyptian representative, Taha bey El-Sayed Nasr, joined in this criticism. These representatives pointed out that the information submitted by governments failed to give adequate data on these matters.

The representatives of the colonial powers at first attempted to bar discussion of the substance of the information and to hold the committee strictly to questions of procedure. When this failed, they argued that conditions in the colonies should be compared with conditions in independent countries in the same geographical area.

The delegate of the United Kingdom, Mr. Poyton, was most insistent on this matter, asserting that "these territories are not backward because they are non-self-governing, but are colonial territories because they are backward."

The British, French and Belgian delegates all gave instances of what their governments had done to promote the welfare of their colonial dependencies. They failed, however, to refute any of the specific points of criticism made by the Indian and Soviet representatives.

Proposals on Future Procedure

One of the most important positive recommendations of the committee to go before the General Assembly was initiated by the Indian representative.

After amendments by the U.S., Australia and Cuba, which detracted from its original effectiveness, the proposal, as approved, recommended that a special committee be constituted "to examine the information transmitted . . . on the economic, social and educational conditions in non-self-governing territories, and to submit reports thereon with recommendations as it may deem fit, and with such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual territories."

It was further recommended that the committee be composed of those states transmitting information for their colonies and an equal number of elective members. This is the composition of the committee originally established and also of the Trusteeship Council, and experience has demonstrated that the point of view of the colonial powers prevails in such an arrangement. Attempts to recommend a larger number of elective members on the committee were defeated.

It now remains for the General Assembly to consider and act on the proposals from its special committee. It is to be hoped that the Assembly's decisions will be truly liberal and in the interest of the colonial peoples.

Analysis of Information

The statistical tables which appear on other pages of this issue were compiled by the Council on African Affairs from the information reports transmitted by the United Kingdom government.

The tables, as a whole, reveal the incompleteness of the data presented for many of the territories. They also reveal clearly that the health and educational needs of the peoples in the areas dealt with are far from being satisfactorily met by government and are, indeed, shockingly neglected in many instances, particularly in the African territories.

The same conclusions may be drawn from the information transmitted by the other colonial powers. Analysis here presented has been confined to the British colonies, partly because they are the most numerous and partly because the statistical information presented is in general more uniform than for the colonies of the other powers.

Eighteen of the British colonies with largest population in Africa, the Caribbean and Asia have been used as the basis of this analysis of educational and health services. No information report has yet been submitted by the United Kingdom for Nigeria with its population of over 22 million and, therefore, it is not included in the analysis.

It is obvious, of course, that statistical tables of this type have their disadvantages. Expenditures for education and health, for example, may include varying items in different territories. And figures for total and school populations in most of the colonies are merely estimates or guesses. Further, the number of doctors or hospital beds should be supplemented by information as to their quality, distribution and accessibility to the population. Nevertheless, the tables do show the general picture of educational and health needs in the colonial territories.

Expenditures for education and health in Table I exclude expenditures for buildings and maintenance and for vocational education (unless indicated as government-aided) where such expenditures are separately listed. For comparative purposes, all sums of money have been converted to U.S. currency at present rates of exchange: £ Sterling=$4.00, $ Hongkong=$.25, $ Malay and Singapore=$.47½, $ Trinidad=$.83⅓.

ALL INFORMATION IN THE TABLES, UNLESS OTHERWISE INDICATED, IS FOR THE YEAR 1946. BLANK SPACES IN THE COLUMNS DENOTE THE ABSENCE OF INFORMATION IN THE REPORT FOR THAT TERRITORY.

We Won't Do Anything About Discrimination, South African Government Tells U. N.

Through its Chairman, Paul Robeson, the Council on African Affairs sharply assailed the report of the South African Government to the United Nations, released on September 15, refusing to abolish legal racial discrimination in that country and acknowledging that "no progress has been made in the settlement of the dispute" between the governments of South Africa and India in pursuance of the resolution adopted by the General Assembly last year based on the complaint of the government of India.

"The South African Government's statement speaks open defiance of the United Nations," said Paul Robeson, "since it condemns and refuses to abide by the decision of the members of the United Nations arrived at last year after prolonged and careful consideration. The statement attempts to revive once more all the arguments which were debated at length and voted down at that session of the Assembly. Those arguments, summarized, amount to the rejection of the right of the United Nations to intervene in settling an international dispute arising from the South African government's policy of maintaining white supremacy."

Continuing, the Chairman of the Council on African Affairs stated, "The South African Government hides behind the charges that the UN Charter is neither explicit nor binding in its provisions concerning the guarantee of 'human rights and fundamental freedoms' to all people 'without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,' and that other nations also practice discrimination in various forms.

"It is for these very reasons," he said, "that the case against the Union of South Africa should be pressed by the United Nations as a clear demonstration to the peoples of America, Africa and the world that the Charter's provisions regarding racial equality are NOT mere empty idealistic expressions which can be ignored and violated with immunity by members of the organization."

Nigerian Delegation Turned Down at Colonial Office

On August 13th, the delegation of the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons under the leadership of Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe visited the Colonial Office to discuss with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Arthur Creech Jones, the memorandum which they had previously laid before him recommending amendments in the Nigerian Constitution and raising certain other matters. If this delegation was received with perhaps a little more show of grace and courtesy than has been extended to some delegations from West Africa within recent years, the result of their mission was nonetheless equally unsuccessful.

Mr. Creech Jones made it clear that it was the intention of the Government to give the constitution which was introduced in 1945 a fair trial and that there was no question of changes being made until experience had shown what was required in the way of amendments. He considered the constitution flexible and adaptable. The government, Mr. Creech Jones emphasized, intended to do all in their power to assist the political, economic and social progress of Nigeria. He strongly urged the delegation to cooperate in this great task.

In regard to some of the other points raised in the memorandum and in the discussion, the Secretary of State informed the the delegation that these would require study and that he hoped to give a reply as soon as possible.

Following the unsatisfactory conference, the delegation took its appeal directly to the British people at meetings in Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, Cardiff, Edinburgh and Glasgow.

The attitude of the Labor Government towards the claim of Nigeria for a more democratic constitution once more demonstrates the identity of views which exists between them and the Tory opposition in imperial matters. Apart from the unrepresentative character of the Legislative Council of Nigeria, there are other features of the constitution which are, to say the least, oppressive.

Take, for example, the subject of local taxation. The Government of Nigeria fixed the contribution of Native Authorities to the central revenue from direct tax at the amounts paid in by them during the year 1943-44. The remainder and the whole of any additional proceeds from any increase in the direct tax was to be retained by the Native Authorities themselves. It was claimed that the Native Authorities would thereby be encouraged "to adopt progressive policies." In actual fact this arrangement has led the Native Authorities to extort as much taxation as possible from their people.

Mrs. Funimilays Ransome-Kuti, a member of the Nigerian Delegation, writing in the London Daily Worker, has recently exposed some of the abominable practices resorted to in the collection of taxes. She states: "In Abeokuta and Ijebu Provinces of Western Nigeria . . . poll-tax and income-tax are forcibly demanded of women . . . Young girls are sometimes stripped naked in the streets by the men officially designated collectors in order to ascertain whether they are mature enough to pay tax or not."

Evidently the government intends to give this system of taxation—and the reprehensible practices which result from it—a "fair trial" before experience shows what amendments are needed.

The Council on African Affairs Calls Upon The General Assembly of The United Nations

—to condemn the South African Government for its failure to place the mandate territory of South West Africa under U.N. trusteeship, and to reiterate the request that this be done forthwith.

—to launch a U.N. investigation into the general denial of human rights to non-white peoples in the Union of South Africa, in view of the failure of the South African Government to seek a solution of the dispute regarding discrimination against Indians in that country, in accordance with the resolution adopted by the General Assembly last year.

—to give maximum implementation to the provisions of the U.N. Charter pertaining to colonial and minority peoples.

—to recommend immediate withdrawal of all foreign troops from Palestine, Indonesia, Egypt and the Sudan, and all other non enemy areas where they remain against the will of the inhabitants, and to seek settlement of the problems of these areas through the United Nations, acting in the interest of the inhabitants of the areas concerned.

We urge all American citizens to make known their support of these proposals by writing to the U.N. Secretary-General, Mr. Trygve Lie, and to members of the U.S. Delegation to the U.N., Lake Success, N. Y.

UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

"SEEING IS BELIEVING" is a new pamphlet published by the Council on African Affairs, just off the press in time to coincide with the UN General Assembly's reconsideration of the questions of South West Africa and discrimination against the Indian minority in the Union of South Africa.

"SEEING IS BELIEVING" contains over 30 large photographs which tell the true story of the plight of the Africans and other non-white peoples in the dominion of South Africa.

"SEEING IS BELIEVING" effectively answers the propaganda of the South African Government and portrays that country as "one of the world's gravest danger spots—in the same class with Europe's Spain and America's Argentina."

REPORT TO ORGANIZATIONS
on the
UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON WORLD TRADE AND EMPLOYMENT
at Havana, Cuba

Over a thousand delegates from sixty-three countries were present for the opening sessions of the World Conference on Trade and Employment called by the United Nations at Havana, Cuba, on November 21. Conferees estimated that the nations present carry on from 90 to 95 per cent of all international trade.

Conference Organization

The conference was greeted on the opening day by the President of Cuba, Ramon Gra San Martin, with other statements of welcome by Assistant Secretary-General Cohen of the United Nations, M. Max Suetens of Belgium who had served at Geneva as President of the Preparatory Committee for the Conference and by representatives of the International Monetary Fund and the International Labor Organization. At the second plenary meeting on November 22, Sergio Clark of Cuba was elected President of the conference and M. Max Suetens of Belgium, first vice-president. Six other vice-presidents representing India, Egypt, New Zealand, Switzerland, Costa Rica, and Czechoslovakia were also elected. Six working committees of the conference have been set up: Committee I dealing with Employment and Economic Activity; Committee II on Economic Development; Committee III on General Commercial Policy; Committee IV dealing with Restrictive Business Practices; Committee V on Inter-Governmental Commodity Agreements; and Committee VI dealing with Organization.

A steering committee for the conference composed of eighteen members includes officers of the conference, chairmen of the committees, and representatives of China, France, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Voting

The conference on December 1 adopted two proposals on conference voting submitted by President Sergio I. Clark (Cuba). It was agreed that decisions of the Conference and its committees should be taken without recourse to a vote whenever possible. Should a vote prove necessary, only UN member states would have the right to cast ballots, the ruling established by the Economic and Social Council.

General Debate

The conference opened with a general debate on the draft Charter which was adopted on August 22 by the eighteen countries of the Preparatory Committee on Trade and Employment of the UN which had met in Geneva, Switzerland, during the spring and summer months. Forty-five countries and three non-governmental organizations took part in the general debate.

Delegates emphasized that the Charter being considered in Havana must be a code of conduct to govern the commercial relationship of the nations of the world whatever their differing economic and political internal structures. Many of the countries emphasized the necessity of lowering tariff barriers and reducing other restrictions on the flow of trade. It was generally agreed that the constructive work done in preparing a preliminary draft Charter would facilitate the effective achievement of a final draft Charter in Havana.

The main concern of a majority of countries has been the problem of economic development, the argument of many undeveloped nations being that the present draft of the Charter "grants benefits only to the economically strong countries and requires disproportionate obligations from the underdeveloped nations". It is argued that some of the commercial policy provisions of the Charter which deal with tariffs, quotas, preferences, and so on provide greater benefits to highly developed nations, such as the United States, and influence negatively the underdeveloped countries. Some countries stated that the Charter should not in any way prevent underdeveloped nations from establishing new industries. There were frequent references to the scarcity of dollars throughout the world and the serious problems such shortages posed in economic recovery activities.

Work of Committees

General debate in plenary session was completed on December 3. Since then meetings of the various committees have been proceeding both for general discussion and for consideration of the many amendments to the Charter submitted by various countries. The deadline for submitting proposed amendments was December 6.

Committee I - Employment and Economic Activity

This committee deals with Chapter II of the ITO draft Charter and its chairman is Mr. J. J. Dedman of Australia. In the general discussion which proceeded for several days the following nations spoke: U. S., Australia, Italy, New Zealand, France, Mexico, Dominican Republic, Cuba, Haiti, Argentina, Uruguay, United Kingdom and Turkey. Several countries expressed agreement with the Chapter as drafted in Geneva while others expressed some concern on such questions as the stability of the United States economy and its willingness both to accept imports and increase long-term foreign investment. Considerable discussion proceeded on the question of possible provisions concerning migratory labor between nations. Almost all speakers in the general discussion emphasized the importance of this Chapter to the Charter.

Committee II - Economic Development

This committee deals with Chapter III of the draft Charter and has as chairman Ramon Beteta of Mexico.

There was considerable discussion in this committee on procedural problems and on the use of Spanish as a working language. Certain members agreed that a footnote to Chapter III seems to equate the term "economic development" with the term "reconstruction", and various measures were proposed to handle the question. Various delegates stressed the importance of economic development in relation to the problems facing under-developed countries and the contribution to the world economy of any progress they made. Two practical ways of promoting economic development through international cooperation were advanced; one, by means of giving to countries both needed financial help and technical advice on the best exploitation of their resources, and two, by encouraging investments on a bilateral and possibly multilateral basis, keeping in mind the necessity of avoiding double taxation.

Committee III - General Commercial Policy

Under the chairmanship of Dana Wilgress of Canada, this committee deals with Chapter IV of the Charter. Debate proceeded on the possibility of raising tariffs and establishing new preference systems by underdeveloped countries as a means of stimulating economic development. Another view, advanced by a representative of a hard currency country, was that today hard currency countries are isolated and some provision must be made for them. The spokesman for the so-called underdeveloped countries repeated views expressed at the opening plenary sessions on the possible handicap to them of specific commercial policy items in this chapter.

Committee IV - Restrictive Business Practices

This committee, concerned with Chapter V of the Charter, has as chairman Mr. Charlone of Uruguay. The general discussion of Chapter V revealed considerable agreement with its basic approach. There was some concern, voice by a Latin American delegate, over inclusion of publicly-owned firms within the provisions of this Chapter.

Committee V - Inter-Governmental Commodity Agreements

This committee, dealing with Chapter VI of the Charter is chaired by George Hakim of Lebanon. Strong statements were made by various delegates in support of this Chapter. Some questions were raised regarding commodities covered by this chapter, relations between FAO and ITO, the selling of primary agricultural products in a controlled market while buying manufactured goods in a free market, and the meaning of the term "efficient producer" used in this Chapter.

Committee VI - Organization

Erik Colban of Norway is chairman of this committee. The only major issue yet discussed in this committee has been on the pros and cons of any separate customs territory being permitted to adhere to the ITO Charter without any reference to the competent metropolitan governments.

United States Delegation

The United States delegation to the Havana meeting is as follows:

Chairman: William L. Clayton, Adviser to the Secretary of State.

Speaking in the opening days of the conference, Will Clayton, Chairman of the U. S. Delegation, voiced the hopes of the American Delegation when he said:

"There will, of course, be differences of opinion among the many nations represented here. Suggestions for changes will be made, and some of them adopted. However, I believe that this Conference will reach agreement on the Trade Charter in substantially its present form.

"....the objectives of the Charter have been widely approved in the United States by many of our newspapers, by leading members of both major political parties, as well as by important labor, business and farm groups and individuals. This is not surprising. Thoughtful people everywhere realize that economic warfare and unemployment and hunger are as dangerous to the peace of the world as military aggression. We must, therefore, agree to work for the establishment and maintenance of world-wide economic order and high levels of production and employment. This we shall try to do at Havana."

REPORT TO ORGANIZATIONS
on
UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON WORLD TRADE AND EMPLOYMENT
at Habana, Cuba.

This is an interim report on developments at the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment at Habana, Cuba, where representatives of approximately 60 countries, carrying on from 90 to 95 per cent of all international trade have been meeting since November 21, 1947. The purpose of the Conference is to agree on a charter for an International Trade Organization as a specialized agency of the United Nations. The Charter will be presented to the governments of the participating countries for ratification. It is to embody principles and standards for the conduct of international economic relations in fields relating to trade, employment, international investment, and economic development.

The basic working document of the Conference is the Draft Charter, approved at Geneva on August 20, 1947 by a Preparatory Committee of eighteen nations set up by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

Because of the highly technical aspects of the Charter, covering many substantive questions each of which might in itself be the basis of an international conference, and because almost two-thirds of the countries present have not participated in earlier international discussions on the proposed Charter, the Habana conference has been characterized by thorough and extensive discussion of every aspect of the proposed ITO.

In view of the United Nations Economic and Social Council meeting at Lake Success, a special plenary session of the Habana meeting was called on February 5 to adopt a resolution for presentation at this session of ECOSOC. The resolution recommends that ECOSOC undertake investigations and studies regarding maintenance of full employment; study and recommend appropriate action covering international aspects of population problems as they relate to employment, production and demand; and with other agencies consider the problems of temporary or seasonal migration of workers.

Various divisions of subject matter contained in the Draft Charter have been considered and modified at Habana by six main committees, each of which has established subcommittees and working parties to deal with specific problems and questions.

Agreement on a very large proportion of the Charter has been reached at the subcommittee and main committee levels. The document being developed at Habana will represent compromises between widely divergent views of different national delegations on important questions. These compromises have been reached through long-drawn-out study, extensive debate, and cooperative effort in hundreds of meetings of subcommittees and main committees.

Principal Issues Being Discussed

The Chairmen of the six main committees, in a report to the General Committee in mid-January, revealed that of the one hundred articles in the Geneva Draft Charter, forty had been agreed upon by the main committees or subcommittees and substantial agreement on an additional forty was in sight. Outstanding and unresolved were seven principal issues involving remaining articles of the Geneva Draft.

They were: (1) Is a member country which wants to use quantitative restrictions for economic development, such as quotas to be required to obtain prior ITO approval for their use?

(2) What limitations should be placed on a member's freedom to enter into new preferential arrangements?

(3) What should be the composition of the Executive Board of the ITO? Should it have permanent seats for the chief economic powers?

(4) What should be the composition and function of the Tariff Committee of the ITO? Is it to determine whether an ITO member has failed to carry out its obligations to negotiate for the reduction of trade barriers, and is there to be a right of appeal against Tariff Committee decisions on such matters?

(5) To what extent should recourse to the International Court of Justice from ITO decisions be permitted?

(6) What rules should be established to govern relations between ITO members and non-members?

(7) Should an Economic Development Committee, which would deal with the special problems of underdeveloped countries, be established under the ITO?

Reviewed below are some of the questions discussed in the six Committees.

Committee I - Employment and Economic Activity

This Committee has been dealing with Chapter II of the ITO Charter. This Chapter as approved by the members of the Committee involves the first international recognition of the relation between domestic stabilization policies and international trade policies. It recognizes the relation between domestic labor standards and competitive situations in international trade and envisages the first commitment on the part of governments to maintain domestic employment and domestic labor standards in the interest of maintaining improved relationships in international trade.

Committee II - Economic Development

Agreement has been reached on articles 9 through 12 on development and investment. The question of international investment for economic development in article 12, Chapter II, posed very real obstacles at the beginning of the Habana meeting. Agreement, however, has been reached on a draft which provides that the members of ITO recognize that international investment, both public and private, can be of great value in promoting economic and consequent social progress; and that the international flow of capital will be stimulated according to the extent that members afford nationals of other countries opportunities for investment and security of capital. Members have the right to take any appropriate safeguards to ensure that foreign investment not be used to interfere with internal affairs or national policies; at the same time they are committed to undertake to provide reasonable opportunities and adequate security for foreign investments suitable to them; to give due regard to avoiding discrimination as between foreign investments; and without prejudice to existing international agreements to which members are parties, to enter into mutually acceptable consultation or negotiations, upon the request of any member, directed toward encouraging capital investment for economic development with adequate security and safeguards.

A proposal has been advanced that an Economic Development Committee be set up under the aegis of the ITO has involved considerable debate. Questions have been raised on: How such a committee should be composed, whether of technical or political experts; what the place of such a Committee would be within the ITO organization; what relation it might have to other United Nations groups concerned with economic development questions.

Committee III - Commercial Policy

Agreement has been reached on most of Chapter IV, and over fifty countries are agreed on technical articles on such subjects as anti-dumping and countervailing duties, valuation for customs purposes, marks of origin, statistics and trade terminology, formalities concerned with imports and exports and publication and administration of trade regulations. On the question of freedom of transit of goods through a foreign country, maritime nations are authorized to grant special transport facilities to landlocked nations without thereby incurring the obligation to grant similar facilities to non-landlocked nations under the most-favored-nation principle. This major agreement on the technical articles represents a monumental advance since the Preparatory Commission meeting in London in the winter of 1946 when the eighteen countries present thought that agreement on those articles was impossible.

One of the questions before the Conference has been an amendment that those nations not in balance of payments difficulties should be free to invoke quantitative restrictions on imports and exports when their domestic economy seemed likely to be threatened by an excess of either. While this amendment has been voted down in committee consideration, an effort is being made to see how this situation can be appropriately met within the framework of the Charter.

Committee IV - Restrictive Business Practices

The Committee has completed work on Chapter V, which represents the first approach ever made in an international instrument toward international action with respect to restrictive business practices. Member nations agree, in effect, to take domestic action designed to prevent practices harmful to international trade whenever such actions restrict production or trade, or otherwise interfere with the basic objectives of ITO. Cases in point are abuses of patents, trade-marks, and copyrights.

Committee V - Inter-Governmental Commodity Agreements

Work has been substantially completed on Chapter VI of the Charter and represents the first international agreement among so many countries on the general principles of commodity policy. Discussion of this committee revolved around two basic considerations: first, that the action taken by any one government to correct maladjustments in respect to one or more commodities should not adversely affect the interests of other nations; and, secondly, that action taken jointly by governments in the interest of producers should not adversely affect the interests of consumers. This chapter recognizes the power possessed by governments to enter into agreements affecting primary commodities, but establishes the two safeguards mentioned above.

Committee VI - ITO Interim Commission

Following the end of the Habana Conference, it is proposed that an Interim Commission be set up to carry on from the end of the conference until the ITO Charter has received sufficient ratifications by national governments to hold its first international conference. It is to develop a provisional agenda and make the necessary arrangements for the first meeting of the ITO. All members of the Habana conference signing the Final Act of the conference are eligible to membership on the Interim Commission which then chooses an Executive Board of eighteen members, and elects an Executive Secretary.

Some nations have argued that the Interim Commission with a Secretariat of around twenty be housed at Lake Success, in order to take advantage of easy access to the United Nations Department of Economic Affairs as well as other United Nations departments and certain specialized agencies such as the FAO and International Monetary Fund.

Other nations have argued that the Secretariat be housed in Geneva because of dollar shortages of many countries. David Owen, Assistant Secretary General for Economic Affairs of the United Nations speaking in Habana on February 4, suggested that meetings of the Interim Commission could be held either in New York or Geneva, but also indicated that it might be easier and more advantageous to place the Secretariat at Lake Success.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Foreword

In April, 1945, the United Nations charter was signed. The organization itself has been in existence only three years. In spite of political disagreements and threats of war, the organization through commissions and agencies (some of them in existence only a few months) has piled up a record of steady achievement. We do not attempt to list them all here. We do list some which may not make headlines but do affect the building of a peaceful world.

World Health Organization (W.H.O.)

1. Checked cholera epidemic in Egypt in the fall of 1947, assembling seven tons of anti-cholera vaccine and other medical supplies from fifteen countries. The epidemic was confined to Egypt and there brought under control in two months.

2. Reduced malaria in some sections of Greece from an incidence of 95% to 5%, due to extensive DDT anti-mosquito campaign.

3. Will test 50,000,000 European children for tuberculosis this year, and vaccinate 15,000,000 against the disease. (This will be administered by the Danish Red Cross under the advice and with the assistance of the W. H. O.)

4. Has awarded fellowships for study to 193 health specialists from nine countries.

5. Has missions carrying on special field service in China, Italy, Ethiopia, Greece, Poland, Austria, Hungary. (This through funds turned over to it from UNNRA.)

6. Is giving top priority to programs for prevention of malaria, tuberculosis, venereal diseases, and is promoting maternal and child health.

United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)

1. Conducted a campaign in 1947 for rebuilding educational systems in devastated areas. (In the United States alone, $100,000,000 was raised in money and supplies.) The campaign will continue in 1948.

2. Has provided books, materials, scientific equipment for laboratories, musical instruments, and fellowship and training scholarships for teachers and students.

3. Has prepared "pilot projects" in latest techniques for mass attacks on illiteracy for Haiti, China, and British East Africa.

4. Is establishing four offices for scientific cooperation in the Middle East, the Far East, India and Latin America.

5. Is prepared to send out educational missions for advice to any government which requests it.

International Refugee Organization (I.R.O.)

1. Is providing food, clothing and shelter for 656,831 displaced persons.

2. Has helped 100,000 displaced persons find new homes.

3. Is seeking resettlement for 850,000 displaced persons and refugees.

International Civil Aviation Organization (I.C.A.O.)

1. Rescued 69 persons from "Bermuda Sky Queen" forced down in the Atlantic as part of the routine work of an ICAO weather and rescue station in the North Atlantic.

2. Has started work on international standards on airworthiness of craft and personnel licensing.

Food and Agriculture Organization (F.A.O.)

1. Has sent agricultural experts to:
   - Siam to boost rice production.
   - Venezuela to increase production of vegetable oil.
   - The Middle East to teach modern farming methods.
   - The Near East to begin work on irrigation and draining projects.
   - Peru to establish refrigeration facilities for its fishing industries.
   - Iran, Czechoslovakia, and China for agricultural aids.
   - Poland for increasing soil fertility and the supply of dairy cattle.
   - Greece to establish a program for rehabilitating and developing agricultural land, water potentialities and related industries.

2. Is preparing a report to boost food production.

3. Has sent supplies of hybrid seed corn to experimental farm schools in Europe.

4. Has organized schools to help technical agricultural experts to "catch up" with agricultural advances made during the last few years.

5. Has held international meeting on control of insects, rats and infestation by fungi in stored foods. (Recommendations sent to U. N. member nations. Will help establish control programs on request by member nations.)

6. Is forming Rice Council for Southeast Asia after having held meetings in India and in the Philippines on rice production.

7. Has held meeting in Cairo in spring of 1948 to draw up plans for small, quick, economical irrigation developments so that food production can be made more certain and adequate.

8. Is arranging regional conference at Cairo.

9. Is studying regional organization for Latin America.

International Trade Organization (I.T.O.)

1. Held organizing conference at Havana where fifty-three nations accepted the charter defining trading and commercial practice.

The Economic and Social Council

This agency supervises and coordinates the programs of a number of commissions and other bodies, such as:

1. International Children's Emergency Fund feeding 3,000,000 children and nursing and expectant mothers in Europe planning to extend its program through additional sum authorized by U. S. Congress, and with the help of some of the money raised through the United Nations Appeal for Children now being carried on in forty countries

2. Advisory Social Welfare Services, first begun by UNRRA, which has sent 24 consultants to 9 countries to re-establish social welfare services has granted fellowships to 109 top social workers from 12 countries

3. Narcotic Drugs Commission which is furthering a remarkably effective international narcotic drug control system exerted gentle pressure at its 1947 meeting which succeeded in curbing the smuggling of opium from Mexico to the U. S.

4. Commission on Human Rights which has drafted an International Declaration of Rights to go to 58 member governments for comment and then to the General Assembly has also drafted a Convention stating certain rights which will be binding upon the states ratifying it.

5. Economic Commission for Europe which has broken bottlenecks, choking European production through (a) efficient truck and railroad transportation; (b) allocation of steel and coal supplies, and (c) export planning and co-operation.

The Trusteeship Council

1. Has received and considered carefully petitions from natives of a number of trust areas.

2. Has nine territories now under its supervision.

The Security Council

Has dealt with over a dozen political disputes and "situations" affecting international peace, such as:

1. Russian troops in Iran.

2. British and French troops in Syria and Lebanon.

3. Franco Spain as a threat to the peace.

4. Disputes between Greece and her three northern neighbors.

5. Fighting between Dutch and Republicans in Indonesia. It succeeded in effecting a truce

6. India-Pakistan dispute.

The General Assembly

Functioned as the world's chief forum and policy-making body

1. Considering questions ranging all the way from disarmament to a proposal for the translation of the classics, from the future of refugees and millions of dependent peoples to the details of United Nations administration, at its first session.

2. At its second session:

established an Interim Committee of the General Assembly, a Special Committee in the Balkans, and the Korean Commission which supervised the recent elections in Southern Korea.

had full debate regarding discrimination against Indians in South Africa and regarding relations with Franco Spain.

made decision concerning partition of Palestine.

voted to establish an International Law Commission to help codify and develop international law.

reached compromises after heated debate concerning war-mongering, false and distorted reports, and war criminals.

approved trusteeship agreements submitted by Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

proposed trusteeship for South West Africa.

received reports of Secretary General, Security Council, Economic and Social Council, and Trusteeship Council.

approved agreements with five "specialized agencies."

UNITED NATIONS

What It Is . . . .

What It Does . .

How It Works . .

New York

THE GREAT MAJORITY OF MANKIND—at that time some 1,700,000,000 people represented by the delegates of 50 nations—resolved on June 26, 1945, "to combine our efforts" to make a secure and better world through "an international organization to be known as the United Nations." On that day, at San Francisco, they signed the CHARTER.

Some weeks later, Poland signed in a space reserved for her, as she had been an original signatory of the United Nations Declaration in 1942, but had been unable to participate in the Conference. In 1946, four other nations were admitted; in 1947, two; and in 1948, 1949, and 1950, one each, bringing the total to 60.

To maintain international peace and security; to develop friendly relations among nations based on the equal rights and self-determination of peoples and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen peace; to achieve co-operation in solving international economic, social, cultural and humanitarian problems and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction of race, sex, language or religion; to be a center for harmonizing the actions of nations in achieving these ends: these are the purposes of the United Nations.

The United Nations is founded on these basic principles:

- All Member States are sovereign and equal.
- All are pledged to fulfil their obligations under the Charter in good faith.
- All are pledged to settle their disputes by peaceful means and in such manner as not to endanger peace, security and justice.
- In its international relations no Member shall use or threaten force against the territory and political independence of any state or behave in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.
- All are pledged to give every assistance to the United Nations when, in accordance with the Charter, it takes any action, and also not to give assistance to any state against which the United Nations is taking action to preserve or restore peace.
- So far as it is necessary to preserve peace and security, the organization shall ensure that countries which are not Members shall also act in accordance with the principles of the Charter.
- The United Nations shall not intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state except when it is acting to enforce the peace.

Membership in the United Nations is open to all peace-loving states which accept the obligations of the Charter and are judged by the organization to be able and willing to carry out these obligations.

With a scope fully as extensive as the whole range of international relations, the United Nations had necessarily to be organized as a group of bodies and the Charter therefore created six "principal organs."

These are the GENERAL ASSEMBLY, the SECURITY COUNCIL, the ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL, the TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL, the INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE and the SECRETARIAT.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

• The main deliberative organ of the United Nations and the nearest equivalent yet to a Parliament of Man is the General Assembly. Meeting usually once a year, the General Assembly has the right to discuss and make recommendations on all matters within the scope of the Charter. It also has the right to discuss the powers and functions of all other organs. It initiates studies and makes recommendations to Member States and to other organs for promoting international co-operation in political, social, economic, cultural, educational and health matters. To help in maintaining international peace and security, the Assembly established, in November 1950, a Peace Observation Commission and a Collective Measures Committee.

The one exception to the Assembly's powers to make recommendations arises when the Security Council is dealing with a dispute or situation. In this event, the Assembly may discuss the matter but cannot make a recommendation unless requested to do so by the Council.

All Member States are represented in the General Assembly, and each has one vote though it may send as many as five representatives to the sessions. On ordinary matters, the Assembly reaches its decisions by a simple majority of those present and voting, and on important matters, by a two-thirds majority.

The Assembly's power to discuss the working and functions of the other organs gives it a central position in the organization. All the organs of the United Nations, including the Security Council, submit annual and special reports to the General Assembly whose duty it is to consider these reports. The Assembly further elects the six non-permanent members of the Security Council, all the 18 members of the Economic and Social Council, and a varying number of members of the Trusteeship Council. Voting independently, the General Assembly and the Security Council elect the judges of the International Court of Justice. Upon the recommendation of the Security Council the General Assembly admits new Members and appoints the Secretary-General who controls the Secretariat.

It is the General Assembly which holds the purse strings, for it considers and approves the budget of the whole organization and apportions the expenses among the Member States. The United Nations is maintained by contributions from its Members.

THE SECURITY COUNCIL

• Eleven members, five of them permanent and six elected by the General Assembly, compose the Security Council, the organ on which Member States have conferred primary responsibility for maintaining peace and security. In performing its functions the Security Council acts on behalf of the Member States, all of whom have agreed to accept and carry out its decisions.

The five permanent members are China, France, the U. S. S. R., the United Kingdom and the United States. The non-permanent members are elected by the General Assembly for two-year terms, and are not eligible for immediate re-election.

Each member of the Security Council has one vote. Decisions on procedural matters are made by an affirmative vote of at least 7 of the 11 members. Decisions on substantive matters also require only 7 votes, but these 7 must include the concurring votes of all the 5 permanent members: this is the rule of "Great Power unanimity," popularly referred to as the "veto." When the Council is taking measures for pacific settlement, a party to the dispute must abstain from voting.

Because the maintenance of peace requires constant vigilance and may call for prompt action, the Security Council is in permanent session and generally meets at least once a fortnight. Should it so decide, the Council may hold its meetings at places other than headquarters.

The Security Council has the right to investigate any dispute or situation which might lead to friction between two or more countries, and such disputes or situations may be brought to the Council's attention either by one of its members, by any Member State, by the General Assembly, or by the Secretary-General, or even, under certain conditions, by a state which is not a Member of the United Nations.

It has the right to recommend ways and means of peaceful settlement and, in certain circumstances, the actual terms of settlement.

In the event of a threat to or breach of peace or an act of aggression, the Security Council has powers to take "enforcement" measures in order to restore peace and security. These include severance of communications, of economic and diplomatic relations and, if required, action by air, land and sea forces.

All Members of the United Nations are pledged by the Charter to make available to the Security Council on its call and in accordance with special agreements, the armed forces, assistance and facilities necessary to maintain peace and security. (These agreements are yet to be negotiated.)

Under the Security Council is a Military Staff Committee, composed of the Chiefs of Staff of the five permanent members or their representatives, which advises and assists the Council on all military matters.

The General Assembly established in January 1946 an Atomic Energy Commission which worked under the direction of the Security Council. In February 1947 the Security Council established a Commission for Conventional Armaments. At its sixth session in 1952, the Assembly decided that these two Commissions should be dissolved and that their functions should be merged in a new and consolidated Disarmament Commission.

THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

• Working under the authority of the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council seeks to build a world of greater prosperity, stability and justice.

It makes studies, reports and recommendations on international economic, social, cultural, educational, health and related matters and also with respect to human rights and fundamental freedoms for all. It prepares draft conventions on these subjects for submission to the General Assembly. It calls international conferences when needed. It gives information and assistance to the Security Council as required and, with the approval of the General Assembly, performs services within its scope for Member States.

Composed of 18 Member States, six of whom are elected each year by the General Assembly for a three-year term, the Economic and Social Council meets as often as is required to perform its duties. It arrives at its decisions by a majority of those present and voting.

Even before the founding of the United Nations, several inter-governmental agencies were at work to deal with specific problems. Some of these have been in existence for many years, such as the International Labor Organization, founded in 1919. Others, like the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, were established after World War II. One of the important tasks of the Economic and Social Council is to bring these organizations, called "Specialized Agencies," into relationship with the United Nations by negotiated agreements and to co-ordinate their activities.

New specialized agencies may become necessary to deal with special problems and, in that case, it is the Economic and Social Council which initiates the negotiations to bring them into existence.

In order to help it discharge its functions, the Economic and Social Council appoints Commissions to deal with particular aspects of its work. These Commissions are small bodies of international authorities on special subjects, and they give expert advice to the Council. New commissions may be created by the Council as required.

Representatives of the Specialized Agencies participate without vote in the proceedings of the Economic and Social Council. The Council also makes consultative arrangements with approved voluntary or non-governmental organizations, working within the sphere of its activities.

THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL AND NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

• In an Article of profound significance, the Charter proclaims two principles with respect to countries which have not yet attained self-government. The interests of the inhabitants of these areas are paramount, the declaration says, and Member States which administer such areas accept certain obligations as a sacred trust: obligations to promote political, economic, social and educational advancement; to provide just treatment and a protection against abuses; to develop self-government; to further international peace and security; and to encourage constructive development.

In accordance with this declaration, Member States which administer non-self-governing territories transmit reports to the Secretary-General on conditions in these territories. These reports are studied and analyzed, and come up for discussion before the General Assembly and other organs so that the world is fully apprised of progress in these areas.

The Charter also set up a Trusteeship System for the administration and supervision of territories which are placed under the System by Member States. Each Member placing a territory under the Trusteeship System submits a trust agreement. The agreement may designate the Member country, any other country, or the United Nations as the "administering power" to administer the area under the terms of the trust agreement. These terms have to be agreed upon by the "states directly concerned" and to be approved by the General Assembly or, in the case of areas designated as strategic, by the Security Council.

The Trusteeship Council, which operates under the authority of the General Assembly, is the principal organ which performs these functions. As regards the strategic areas, the Security Council has to avail itself of the assistance of the Trusteeship Council on political, economic, social and educational matters.

The Trusteeship Council is composed of (1) Member countries administering trust territories; (2) permanent members of the Security Council which are not administering trust territories; and (3) as many other members (elected for three-year terms by the General Assembly) as may be necessary to ensure equality in numbers between administering and non-administering members.

The Trusteeship Council considers reports submitted by the administering authority. It accepts petitions and examines them in consultation with the authority. It may provide for periodic visits to the trust territories, and takes other measures in conformity with the terms of trusteeship agreements.

THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

• The principal judicial organ of the United Nations is the International Court of Justice which sits at The Hague in the Netherlands. Fifteen judges elected independently by the Security Council and the General Assembly compose the Court.

The Court functions under a Statute which is a part of the Charter of the United Nations, and every Member State of the United Nations therefore has automatic access to the Court. Every Member is also pledged to comply with the decisions of the Court in any case to which it is a party.

The jurisdiction of the Court comprises all cases which the parties refer to it, and all matters specially provided for in the Charter or in treaties and conventions in force.

In addition to judging legal disputes which are submitted to it, the Court performs an important function in giving advisory opinions on legal matters which

THE SECRETARIAT

• The vast administrative functions of the United Nations are performed by the sixth principal organ, the Secretariat, the agency which, working the year round, services the other organs and administers the programs and policies laid down by them. At its head is the Secretary-General, who is appointed by the General Assembly on the recommendation of the Security Council.

In February 1946, Trygve Lie, then Foreign Minister of Norway, was appointed Secretary-General for a five-year term. At the fifth session of the Assembly, he was continued in office for a period of three years.

The Secretariat comprises the Executive Office of the Secretary-General, a Technical Assistance Administration, and eight departments which are concerned, respectively, with Security Council affairs, economic affairs, social affairs, trusteeship and information from non-self-governing territories, legal matters, public information, conference and general services, and administrative and financial matters.

The duties and responsibilities of the Secretariat are exclusively international. Each member of the staff, whatever his nationality, is an international civil servant who serves the world and, in so doing, serves also the highest interests of his own country.

WE THE PEOPLES OF THE UNITED NATIONS determined

To save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind, and

To reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small, and

To establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained, and

To promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom, and for these ends

To practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbors, and

To unite our strength to maintain international peace and security, and

To ensure, by the acceptance of principles and the institution of methods, that armed force shall not be used, save in the common interest, and

To employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples, have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims.

Accordingly, our respective Governments, through representatives assembled in the city of San Francisco, who have exhibited their full powers found to be in good and due form, have agreed to the present Charter of the United Nations and do hereby establish an international organization to be known as the United Nations.

Our Enlightened Self-Interest And the United Nations

A. A. BERLE, JR.

A CAMPAIGN, first to push the United Nations out of the United States, and then to pull the United States out of the United Nations, is now well developed. It is still covert—the full battery has not been unmasked. But it is clear enough that before long one bloc of American politicians will reveal its true aim of destroying the United Nations, if it can, in a burst of isolationist nationalism.

This writer, no collector of stardust in international affairs, recognizes that the public opinion which supported the United States government in organizing the United Nations was moved by sentiment, aspiring toward a mighty dream. Appeal was made to the straining, eternal, and eternally disappointed hope of the American public that the world could be so governed as to avoid perpetual fear of war and periodic mass slaughter. Well, now it appears that the hope is not to be immediately realized. From resulting disillusionment comes a return to self-seeking nationalism, and such bitterness can be exploited by politicians. So, say the new flag-wavers, let's give up the United Nations as an impractical, un-American dream.

Cold analysis indicates that these new isolationists may be quite as dangerous to the safety of the United States as are Communist conspirators. The case rests not on stardust but on the implacable arithmetic of present reality. Reality indicates that the American political architects of the United Nations were not the dreamers or the stargazers. Cordell Hull, their leader, was in fact, the canniest, coolest, least sentimental politician in Washington. Senator Arthur Vandenberg was a hard-headed Michigan Republican Dutchman. Their allies ranged all the way from Senator Byrd of Virginia to John Foster Dulles of

New York. Their reasoning was built on grim reality.

The controlling facts are beyond dispute:

Prior to 1918, the world outside the Western Hemisphere (blanketed by the Monroe Doctrine) was run by twelve empires. There were Britain, France, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Italy, and three smaller nations: Belgium, the Netherlands, and Portugal. In the East were two moribund empires, Turkey and China, and one young empire, Japan. A few marginal countries, like Switzerland and the Scandinavian nations, survived outside the imperial system—chiefly by consent.

As long as these empires were run by sane men—that is, men who reckoned with arithmetic—they had more in common than they had in difference. They knew war advantaged no one. So, for a century after the Peace of Vienna in 1815, war, when it broke out, was promptly limited and fought only for minor, clearly defined objectives.

The twentieth century unloosed essentially irrational forces, like Pan-Germanism and Pan-Slavism, with romantic visions of world conquest. This led directly to the First World War. That war released still greater irrational forces, notably the perversion of Communism into a Great-Russian push to dominate the world through revolution-conquest, and a Nazi-Fascist mania in whose name Hitler made his military bid for world supremacy. The result was the Second World War. When the battle smoke of the two wars cleared away, none of the great empires emerged intact, save only Russia's. The others were destroyed or so weakened that the imperialist system had ceased to exist. This was the situation as it stood in the spring of 1945. It so stands today.

None of the sixty-odd nations succeeding these empires—with the single exception of the Soviet Union—is able alone to maintain its business and economic life as a going concern. This is true of the United States. Orators proclaim that the United States is the most powerful country in the world. This statement is based on figures showing the huge American "economic potential." But America, to maintain its power, must now draw on supplies far exceeding those available within the continental limits of the country. It must have metals, and ultimately oil, from Canada, South America, and Africa. It needs tin and rubber from Bolivia and Malaya. It requires rarer metals, like nickel, chrome, manganese, cobalt, beryllium, and so forth, from all parts of the world. There are at least twenty essential materials the cutting off of which would cripple this country in peace or war. The go-it-alone theory simply does not add up.

The United States could, no doubt, follow the Stalinist plan and start conquering an empire. At a cost of, say, three hundred thousand American lives and $100 billion, we could seize Canada, Central and South America, the Pacific archipelagoes, and some spare chunks of the African continent. To do this would probably involve the country in a Third World War, the precise thing we do not want. Even without that, defending the empire thus created would be infinitely more costly in money (leaving morals out) and in human freedom than maintaining a co-operative alliance. For its maintenance, a standing army of at least six million would be necessary—say three years' compulsory military service for every American boy. You could finance ten Marshall Plans for half the cost of creating, let alone maintaining, that sort of empire for even a few years.

Short of this, the United States, to be safe and well off, must work in some sort of composite of many nations besides itself. The question is not whether it moves within the framework of a league of nations. The only question is what kind of a league of nations it must be.

Taking Inventory

Elementary strategic arithmetic arrives at the same result. It is grim, but worth summarizing.

In case of a new world war, it should be kept in mind that the United States has a population of 157 millions; for realistic purposes we can perhaps assume that Canada with 14 millions will stay with us, making 171 millions. Out of these would have to be mobilized the ultimate defense force. Perhaps, though uncertainly, we might draw on the sparsely populated regions of Central and South America. The total population of the hemisphere outside the United States and Canada is approximately 150 millions. Of these a considerable proportion would be unavailable for general defense for a variety of reasons. The best we could present from this hemisphere alone would be a front of perhaps 225 million. It is settled that ten per cent is the maximum number of people that can be withdrawn for defense without a breakdown of the civilian economy. Not more than 23 million people would conceivably be available in the event of a showdown.

The Russians have 200 millions within the Soviet Union. But they also dominate huge land areas around the Russian base, notably mid-Europe and China. At a minimum, they could now draw on a total population of 800 million. This gives a manpower of reserve of from 60 to 80 million available for Soviet military effort. The greatest single lesson of the Korean War is its demonstration that the Soviet Union can organize Chinese and other Asian manpower into an effective, modern fighting army. By itself, or even in conjunction with the entire Western Hemisphere, the United States would be helplessly outnumbered if land armies ever met.

Before 1918, the isolationists argued, and they now argue again, that we had best stay behind the screen of two oceans, using our isolation as our defense, so that any war would be essentially naval. The argument had force in 1916. The point was still arguable in 1939, when bombers had short range and the Atlantic could only be crossed by using halfway bases at Greenland or Iceland or by making the short hop from the shoulder of Brazil to the shoulder of Africa. But today a plane can take off from Europe, circle over the United States, and return to base without refueling. Tomorrow, we expect to have atomic-powered airplanes capable of almost unlimited range—and so do the Russians. We might decide not to commit our armies on the far side either of the Atlantic or the Pacific, and to pound away with airplanes based at convenient points on this side of the ocean or elsewhere. So we could. But so could the Russians. In this hideous long-range artillery duel, fought with atomic bombs (probably H-bombs), the United States might arrange not to lose the war. It could hardly arrange to win. Both sides would come out of it wounded beyond imaginable horror. But the Communists would be betting 800 million lives against the Americas' 225 million, and they are just the kind of people to reckon coldly on losing 100 million of their own people if they can kill, maim, or immobilize 100 million Americans. The result could leave them masters of the world.

If, on the other hand, America is part of a composite of nations equal to or greater than half the world, that bitter exchange would not be profitable by Communist reckoning. I respect Communist strategic thinking, little as I like it. They play to win. Unless they see ultimate victory, they do not start. As long as the non-Communist world has organization and reasonable probability of unified action—as much unified action as the United Nations developed in Korea—the Communists' arithmetic will not take them into a general war, granted that our armament is reasonably strong.

What is true of the United States is quadruply true of the smaller countries—for example, Great Britain, France, and Japan. The net result is that we have the most powerful possible interest—and all other countries of the free world have an equal interest—in finding, maintaining, and upholding an organization which keeps us together, offering reasonable possibility of mobilization in case of war.

ENEMIES of the United Nations like to say that the United Nations could not easily mobilize a force, that it is difficult to make the members work together, and that few countries bear as large a share of the expense and cost as does the United States. This is not true. France, in defending Indo-China, has spent proportionately more money and life than the United States has spent in the defense of Korea.

But take the matter at its worst. The United Nations is at present the only common denominator we have with all nations of the free world. In the Korean case, it did work as a means of mobilization of force. Even where troops and money were not directly contributed, the nations involved contributed their geography for strategic movement. The agreements contained in the Charter of the United Nations are a pledge to mutual defense in case of breach of the peace by anyone, including the Soviet Union. It is plain dumb to throw all this into the trash can merely because someone surmises that the structure might not stand up in case of attack. The job is to hold on to what exists, to make it stand up, to strengthen it in every possible way.

Actually, the defense system of the United States rests now on a series of interlocking alliances, all held together by and within the framework of the United Nations. The important ones are: the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance—the defensive alliance of the American hemisphere set up by the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro in 1948; the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) of 1949, which now takes in Turkey and Greece as well as western Europe; the European Defense Community Agreement providing for building a European army; and the proposed Pacific Pact (United States, Australia, New Zealand, etc.). All these pacts buttress the structure of the United Nations. Through the wisdom of Mr. Nelson Rockefeller, Senator Arthur Vandenberg, and Governor Harold Stassen, the famous "Article 51" of the United Nations Charter specifically authorizes such agreements for "collective self-defense."

In effect, the United Nations is a grand alliance against aggression. It is not perfect. Like every alliance that ever was or will be, it can be levered into action only with difficulty. But it is infinitely better than no alliance at all. Imagine that tomorrow morning you read in the headlines, UNITED NATIONS DISSOLVED; UNITED STATES STANDS ALONE. The mere announcement would change the entire pattern of national thinking and national life.

The Soviet View

Now let us look for a moment at the Kremlin side.

Stalin was very frank a few weeks ago in his signed essay designed to guide the most recent world conference of the Communist Parties. He expects the operation of the capitalist system to cause quarrels for markets and that capitalist nations—that is, the nations of the free world—will fall out and go to war with each other. The Kremlin then expects to intervene and take over completely. He did not state his plans about the United Nations, but they are reasonably clear, too. He would like, sometime, to take over the United Nations. Not being able to do that now, his delegations aim at exploiting, so far as possible, differences and quarrels among the nations of the free world. But in seven years the Kremlin has been unable to open any major breach between the free-world nations, and will be unable to do so unless the free-world diplomats are guilty of almost criminal folly.

The possibility of quarrels between free-world nations is considerable; but the United Nations is at present the greatest single agency for composing the differences. It was able to limit the incidence of the Arab-Israel war. It has been able to prevent Pakistan-Indian fighting from flaring into war over Kashmir. It can be called in should the nations of western Europe come to odds. It did unite the free world in resistance to the Communist push for South Korea. Short of a death wish or suicide complex in the western nations, it should be able to handle most of the disputes which are likely to arise among sane men. Thus far the presence of the Stalinist bloc has acted not to divide but to unite the free world within the United Nations. Stalinist strategy is inherited from Genghis Khan and, after him, Tamerlane, who specialized in cajoling one nation with false favors while attacking a neighbor nation. It is vastly harder to do this when the entire free world meets in open, friendly assembly as it does in the United Nations.

Because the United Nations includes the Soviet Union and its captive governments, its operations are a headache to American diplomats. But to Moscow, the headaches must be even greater. Russian delegations can snarl in Assembly sessions and committees but they cannot disturb the interloeking alliances noted above. Even outside the "collective-security groups" the more neutralist nations are held, through the United Nations, in working arrangements with the free western world. Pakistan, India, Burma, Siam, and Indonesia, for example, within the United Nations, steadily work for a free world to a measurable extent. Were the United Nations to break up, they would either become isolated targets or, at best, a neutral bloc. Under the United Nations Charter, an attack on any one of them might well engage the force of the entire free world. The Soviet empire knows this; so do even the "neutralist" nations; and their interests accordingly lie more with the free world than with Moscow.

In any case, from the American point of view, the United Nations—the Soviet bloc included—is preferable to the formalized split that would result if the United Nations were to break up. Then indeed the world would at best be divided into two blocs, maneuvering for position while openly awaiting the outbreak of a Third World War; at worst, the Soviets would have an open reason in which to stalk, hunt, and seize nearby isolated countries.

From the Kremlin point of view, the United Nations as presently constituted is a pain in the neck which can neither be controlled nor broken up. All Stalin really needs is a group of Americans shortsighted enough to do his work for him. That perhaps is why there are no Communist attacks on men like Gerald L. K. Smith (Chairman of the Nationwide Committee for the Abolition of the United Nations); William Henry MacFarland, Jr. (the American Flag Committee and the Nationalist Action League); Congressman John T. Wood of Idaho, who franks out MacFarland's material; Tom Lindner, the Georgia State Commissioner of Agriculture, who sends out attacks on the United Nations; Suzanne Stevenson of the Minute Maids and Vivien Kellems of the Liberty Belles; or Frank Holman of the American Bar Association, whose extreme nationalist position has split the association. Paradoxically, the hatchetmen of the Hearst newspapers talk language which often closely parallels the Communist Party line. There is no left-wing opposition to the so-called "Bricker Amendment," whose effect would be to make American participation in the United Nations virtually inoperable.

At the moment, the campaign against the United Nations is the primary property of a lunatic fringe of the extreme Right, abetted by a few men who ought to know better, and who are constructing "front" organizations taking in groups of people who object to specific uses of the United Nations. But it is clear that the real objective of these groups is a major political movement to end American membership in the United Nations.

From the hardest-boiled examination of the American system, this is a blueprint for disaster.

THE FOREGOING analysis left the dream of an effective peace system wholly out of account. But it can not be left out of account. Historically the millions of Americans who nourished that dream were following a sounder instinct than the spurious isolationism put forward now. In international affairs, dreams do have validity if they are accurately appraised and dealt with for what they are.

Throughout much of history, the dream of a world ordering of affairs which shall maintain peace has been a dominant ideal. In the form of the Holy Roman Empire, of which the Catholic Church was the central organizing unit, it achieved some degree of peace in an anarchic Europe for some centuries. In a later resurgence, the Concert of Europe maintained a notable peace in the days of the twelve empires. Those periods in history when no such dream found effective expression were periods of sheer, stark anarchy. This is not to idealize. It is to say that historically a peace system, however imperfect, is better than no peace system at all. A dream pursued does lead to some reality, though reality falls infinitely short of the dream. The groups that are now fighting the United Nations ought to be told, with great bluntness, that their fight injures, weakens, and endangers the United States.

U.S. Constitution and U.N. Charter: An Appraisal

Address by Secretary Dulles[1]

Our association is celebrating its Diamond Jubilee. When it was founded in 1878, our country was at peace and foreign war seemed remote. Now we have had three foreign wars in quick succession, and, because we are a principal source of free-world strength, we face the intense hostility and growing might of the Soviet-dominated world.

It has become no easy task to assure the safety of the United States.

Our Army, Navy, and Air Force necessarily constitute an ultimate reliance. But they are only partial insurance against disaster. We do not want to have to depend on our own unaided strength. Any free-world nation which attempts, singly, to match the military might which a totalitarian system can extract out of one-third of the people and one-third of the natural resources of the world will wreck its domestic economy. It will have to impose sweeping governmental controls which will destroy the very freedom it defends. Further, no measures that we take in isolation will assure our supply of strategic materials.

There is but one answer to the coerced unity of the Soviet-dominated world. That answer is the voluntary association of free nations for the common defense. To win friends and allies, to bind them to us and us to them in dependable ways, is, therefore, an essential aspect of U.S. foreign policy.

[1] Made before the American Bar Association at Boston on Aug. 26 (press release 458 dated Aug. 25).

Mutual Security

The master security treaty of our time is the Charter of the United Nations. It has been adhered to by 60 nations. It represents the world's best hope of peace with justice. But the United Nations, in its present form, has not met all our expectations. I shall speak more of that later.

Because the United Nations itself does not provide adequate security, the United States has, by bipartisan action, entered into a series of treaties with other nations for the purpose of furthering collective self-defense. This is authorized by the U.N. Charter.

We have the North Atlantic Treaty Organization of 14 nations, designed to insure the peace and safety of the North Atlantic community.

We have the so-called Rio Pact of 21 American Republics, designed to promote peace and mutual security in the Western Hemisphere.

In the Pacific, we have mutual defense or security treaties with the Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, and Japan. Two weeks ago I initialed a proposed mutual-defense treaty with the Republic of Korea,[2] and we have close ties with Nationalist China on Formosa.

These security treaties have been implemented by a series of base agreements made by the President. These give our armed forces the means to operate abroad more effectively in the protection of our security. For example, one plane based abroad may be the equivalent of three like planes based here at home. Under the Mutual Security Act we have joined to build up strategically located military establishments in which we share, such as NATO. The result is that we and others can keep our defense expenditures within limits compatible with a free domestic economy.

In addition to treaties and agreements dealing expressly with matters of security, we must have many other kinds of treaties. No treaty of alliance is dependable without the added ingredient of friendliness. This requires treaties of friendship, commerce and trade, reciprocal-trade agreements, extradition treaties, agreements defining the status of forces located abroad, treaties controlling the drug and narcotic trade, treaties in avoidance of double taxation, and a multitude of other agreements that are necessary to put international intercourse on a friendly and nonfriction basis.

Treaties and executive agreements are the political tools which make it possible to provide our Nation with an environment of security.

[2] BULLETIN of Aug. 17, 1953, p. 204.

The Constitutional Problem

At this juncture a movement has grown up to limit severely the treatymaking power and to curtail the authority of the President to conduct international business.

This movement reflects concern that our treaty power might be used to effectuate domestic reforms, particularly in relation to economic and social matters, and to impose upon our country socialistic conceptions which are alien to our traditional American ideals.

These fears were largely founded upon the activities of certain committees of the United Nations.

I believe that this concern, when it arose, was a legitimate one, and that those who voiced it performed a genuine service in bringing the situation to the attention of the American public.

But I point out the arousing of that concern was a correction of the evil—a correction in the most dependable way, that is, by the vigilance of our citizenry. The danger, never great, has passed.

Proposed Constitutional Amendments

However, some fear that the danger may recur and that our citizenry may not then be alert. So, various Constitutional amendments have been proposed, with a view to preventing possible future abuses of the treatymaking power.

None of these proposals takes the form of trying to confine treatymaking to the historic and, I believe, Constitutional sense of that word. It seems to me that "treaties" within the meaning of our Constitution are contracts with foreign governments designed to promote our national interests by assuring that our Nation and others will act internationally in a way deemed mutually advantageous.

I do not believe that "treaties" within the meaning of article VI of our Constitution, which provides that treaties "shall be the supreme Law of the Land," are measures of primarily domestic import, or that the treaty form can lawfully be used to circumvent the Constitutional procedures established in relation to what are essentially internal affairs.

That concept is difficult to put into Constitutional words. Perhaps for that reason those who would now amend the Constitution have adopted a more rigid and less selective approach.

Let me refer to the amendment proposed by S.J. Res. 1.[3] Section 1 provides that any provision in a treaty which conflicts with the Constitution shall be of no force or effect.

I believe that this states the law as it now is. However, some seem to feel that the question is in doubt, and fears in this regard have been widely spread. To meet any legitimate fears on this score, President Eisenhower has stated that he approves a Constitutional amendment, such as that introduced by Senator Knowland,[4] which will make it clear that a treaty cannot override the Constitution or deprive citizens of their rights under our Constitutional Bill of Rights.

The remaining provisions of S.J. Res. 1 would make fundamental changes. Section 2 would cut down the Nation's treaty power so that no treaty could bind the Nation in respect of matters which, under our Federal system, fall within the jurisdiction of the States. This would set the clock back to an approximation of the condition which existed under the Articles of Confederation. Then, that condition was so intolerable and it so jeopardized the Confederation that the present Constitution was adopted to give the Federal Government authority, in international matters, to act for all the Nation, including the States.

Let me tell you of our experience with treaties in the present session of the Congress.

Since it convened in January 1953, the Senate has approved 23 treaties, 12 of which, our legal advisers say, would be unconstitutional if the proposed amendment had been in effect, because they deal with matters of State jurisdiction, such as negotiable instrument laws, local licensing laws, etc. In the case of 8 of these 12 treaties the Senate vote was 86 yea's to 1 nay. Included in the 86 who voted in favor of these treaties were 55 of the 64 Senators who were originally listed as sponsors of S.J. Res. 1, which would have made the treaties unconstitutional.

This suggests, I think, that the import of the proposed amendment is not fully understood, even in the Senate. Also I suggest that the Senators, when it comes down to concrete cases, recognize that our Nation must be able to make treaties which will bind not only the Federal Government but also the States.

Executive Agreements

Section 3 of the proposed amendment would give the Congress the power to regulate all executive and other agreements.

No more fundamental change in our Constitutional system can be imagined, for under it Congress and not the President would be responsible for the day-by-day conduct of our foreign relations.

The phrase "executive agreements" brings to mind such major wartime commitments as were made at Yalta and Potsdam, and which have proved unpopular and perhaps ill-advised. But "executive agreements" are the means, and the only means, whereby the President carries on the day-to-day business of dealing with other nations. Daily the President, directly or through his diplomatic or military agents, makes agreements with foreign nations. In the State Department, for example, we may agree that Foreign Ministers will meet at a certain time and place. Perhaps we agree with the British and French on a joint note to the Soviet Union about Germany. Perhaps we agree with other members of the United Nations upon a proposed resolution. Agreements are the warp and woof of international life, and without them there could not be friendly international intercourse.

The Korean armistice was made by a U.S. military commander under instructions from Washington. This armistice agreement was the climax of a series of subsidiary agreements, some made with our enemies in relation to procedures as to armistice negotiations. Some were made with the Republic of Korea, and some were made with our U.N. allies in Korea. Many of these agreements I made under the authority of the President.

The more important of these agreements were made after informal consultation with congressional leaders. The security treaty which I initialed in Korea will of course be effective only with the advice and consent of the Senate. Agreements for economic rehabilitation are subject to congressional appropriations. But these conspicuous agreements, requiring Senate or congressional action, grew out of a series of preliminary agreements which were indispensable to the final result. These were of a multiplicity and of an immediacy which excluded the assumption of responsibility by a deliberative assembly like the Congress.

[3] For text and for a statement by Secretary Dulles in opposition to the resolution, see ibid., Apr. 20, 1953, p. 594.

President Eisenhower has stated his views on these matters in the following words:[5]

> . . . I am unalterably opposed to any amendment which would change our traditional treatymaking power or which would hamper the President in his constitutional authority to conduct foreign affairs. Today, probably as never before in our history, it is essential that our country be able effectively to enter into agreements with other nations.

I can say to you soberly that the proposed amendment, except for section 1 which President Eisenhower accepts, would have a calamitous effect upon the international position and prospects of the United States. It would make it impossible for the United States to share in the voluntary and friendly association of free nations which is necessary to offset what the Soviet Premier refers to as the "monolithic unity" of the Soviet system. It would make it impractical for the President to conduct foreign affairs and would throw upon the Congress in this respect a daily and incessant responsibility which such a numerous and already overburdened legislative body is, in practice, incapable of discharging.

The Test of Experience

We have a system which has survived for over 160 years without there being a single instance of treaty abuses such as are feared. Of course, abuse is always a possibility. I admit that. I not only admit it, I have said it. But I do not admit that, because power can be abused, it follows that power should be annulled. That is the reasoning that leads to anarchy.

[5] Ibid., p. 192.

If the United States renounces the power to act effectively in international affairs, because that power might be abused, the result will be a large measure of international anarchy.

It is impossible to rewrite the Constitution of the United States so that it is foolproof. It is impossible to make freedom so automatic that its retention does not need constant vigilance.

The supreme test of any Constitution is the way it works. George Washington, in his Farewell Address, warned against amending the Constitution to meet hypothetical dangers. "Experience," he said, "is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country. Facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion."

Our Constitution, as it is, has served us well for 160 years in the field of foreign relations. There is no actual experience to demonstrate the need of the far-reaching changes that have been proposed. The fears are hypothetical. The facts are reassuring.

The founders of this Nation, seeing international peril, created power to meet it. They enabled the Nation to speak as a unit and with prompt, effective authority in the field of foreign relations. The system worked well. Today, we face a new and perhaps even greater peril than that which the founders confronted. We need that same political authority which they provided. If it is taken away, I see only a steady increase in our peril and a steady decline in our capacity to meet that peril.

International Law and Order

Physical scientists have enabled man to destroy himself. Political wisdom must enable man to save himself. Political leadership that timidly goes backward will never cope with scientific knowledge which goes ever forward.

This administration has a vision of something better than bare survival in the face of danger. We have faith that it is possible to end the menace under which humanity has existed for so long. It was hoped that the United Nations would achieve this, and I still believe that it can. But to realize this hope will require that the Charter be altered in some important respects.

The U.N. Charter now reflects serious inadequacies.

One inadequacy sprang from ignorance. When we were in San Francisco in the spring of 1945, none of us knew of the atomic bomb which was to fall on Hiroshima on August 6, 1945. The charter is thus a pre-atomic-age charter. In this sense it was obsolete before it actually came into force. As one who was at San Francisco, I can say with confidence that, if the delegates there had known that the mysterious and immeasurable power of the atom would be available as a means of mass destruction, the provisions of the charter dealing with disarmament and the regulation of armaments would have been far more emphatic and realistic.

A second inadequacy sprang from the fact that the three leaders who planned the United Nations were President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Churchill, and Generalissimo Stalin, precisely the three who led the wartime victory coalition against Hitlerite Germany. Inevitably, they looked upon the United Nations as a kind of peacetime prolongation of the wartime triumvirate. Consequently, the proposals initially put forward by the United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Russia placed primary authority in the Security Council and stipulated that the great powers permanently represented on that Council must be in agreement.

At San Francisco this concept was to some extent altered and greater scope was given to the General Assembly. However the "veto" remained in the Security Council and the General Assembly was permitted only to "recommend." Indeed, the Assembly voting procedure, with one vote per nation, precludes its decisions having more than advisory weight.

Now we see the inadequacy of an organization whose effective functioning depends upon cooperation with a nation which is dominated by an international party seeking world domination.

A third inadequacy came out of disregard for the fact that world order, in the long run, depends not on men but upon law—law which embodies eternal principles of justice and morality. When the charter was drafted at Dumbarton Oaks, it contained no mention of the word "justice" or of the word "law." That defect was to some extent remedied at San Francisco. At several points in the charter, references to "justice" were introduced. Also the General Assembly was required to promote "the progressive development of international law and its codification." However, in the 8 years of its existence, the General Assembly has made but little progress in this respect.

I recall the views expressed by that great statesman and student of public affairs, the late Sen. Robert A. Taft. In his book entitled A Foreign Policy for Americans, he said of the U.N. Charter:

> The fundamental difficulty is that it is not based primarily on an underlying law and an administration of justice under that law. I believe that in the long run the only way to establish peace is to write a law, agreed to by each of the nations, to govern the relations of such nations with each other and to obtain the covenant of all such nations that they will abide by that law and by decisions made thereunder.

The opportunity which Senator Taft saw has not irrevocably passed. The present Charter of the United Nations provides that the 1955 General Assembly will have on its agenda a proposal to call a general conference to review the present charter. I have already announced that the United States will then vote in favor of holding such a review conference.

The 1955 conference will be comparable in its importance to the original San Francisco conference. It will provide a conspicuous opportunity for which the lawyers of America should be prepared. There are, of course, many other opportunities.

The important thing is that the Bar of America, which exerts a powerful influence on the thinking and political action of the American people, should itself be looking forward and inventively and creatively try to solve the great problems which confront our people at this time. The founders of our Nation showed a political wisdom which has rarely if ever been matched. Surely, however, their effort did not exhaust the political genius of the American people. They invented and bequeathed to us an ordered society of spiritual and intellectual freedom. Such a society ought to be able to produce the new ideas needed to meet changing conditions. That is for us to demonstrate. Now, when new peril threatens, it behooves us to prove our worth. May we not, in our generation, emulate what our forebears did in their generation, and find the way to develop international order to shield national life? That is the challenge of our time. Let us dedicate ourselves to meet it.

24TH & N STREETS N. W., WASHINGTON 7, D. C.

Dear American:

If you find yourself struggling to make sense out of world news, don't worry about it -- millions of other Americans are in the same boat.

All of us realize that in this American era in world affairs, when all the world looks to us for leadership, we should know more about our world neighbors. We should be able to think clearly and speak with authority on what's going on in all parts of the world.

Why can't we? Because we see headlines about Azerbaijan or Jehol or Karachi. About the French devaluing the franc. About trouble in Argentina. About socialism in Britain. About the threat of Russia. And we're confused. Everybody is trying to give us "hot" news. And hot news often has no perspective. No background. No real meaning.

And so it is that America now has its first weekly newsmagazine devoted exclusively to making sense out of world news. You'll want to remember its name: WORLD REPORT -- for it is one you'll hear quoted a lot, in the press, at the luncheon table, in business conferences, in the world's capitals. For that reason, perhaps you'd like to subscribe for it now -- by using the enclosed card to enter a trial subscription at our special introductory rate.

With World Report, you will be able to think clearly and talk authoritatively whenever the subject of foreign affairs comes up. Because you'll know. You'll know what happened. What the next development is likely to be. Why it's important. What its impact will be on other countries, on us, on business.

You'll know just as if you had been on the spot -- for your representative will be there. You'll know just as if you had dug into atlases and histories and economic geographies and confidential government documents, and talked to business and political leaders, to kings and common people -- for that's what your staff will do. In London, Cairo, Shanghai, Rio, Berlin -- or wherever else things are happening that Americans should know about.

In terse, discerning reports, you'll get the political, economic and business outlook for world affairs. Illustrated, analytical studies give you background and understanding of situations and events of major importance. You get pictures and maps and charts which so often tell the story better than words. Unique Worldgraphs lend meaning and interest -- Worldgraphs which enable you to grasp trends so quickly.

You'll find World Report a lively, dramatic, interesting newsmagazine which makes of every reader a well-informed, interesting citizen of the world we live in. And for many, it opens up new business opportunities, new sources of raw materials, new markets for machinery, for finished products, new and profitable outlets for investment.

Because we realize that our readers will be the most exacting, most discriminating group in the world, this becomes a million dollar undertaking. If you know The United States News, you know the thorough job we are doing.

Because World Report is a new magazine, and because we want to provide you with an inducement to send your order promptly, we are extending to you a special introductory offer: the next 34 issues for only $2.67. The cost of these issues at the single copy price is $5.10. This offer, for new subscribers only, saves you $2.43.

The enclosed card will bring us your acceptance of this special money-saving offer promptly. Simply fill in your name and address and mail the card, today. Postage on the card is prepaid -- ready for mailing now.

Sincerely yours,

FOR BUSY PEOPLE who must keep up with a busy world

. . . empire builder?

. . . how long a period of grace?

. . . "each week more hectic than the last"

WORLD REPORT PUSHES BACK THE HORIZONS OF YOUR WORLD

Momentous days lie ahead. With the shooting part of World War II behind us, each passing day sees the lines drawn more closely for the battle to win the Peace.

Have the people of the United States the will and the determination to follow through on the course to which the War committed them, now that War's unifying influence is gone?

How far will Soviet Russia go in her efforts to expand her political empire through use of the techniques she is now testing out?

How long can the U. S. use the secret of the atomic bomb to insure good behavior of other nations? And what happens when this period of grace runs out?

Which way will Latin America go—a realistic Latin America which has already taken cognizance of our internal dissension and the resulting lack of flow of goods to her markets?

Can England continue her come-back? What will come of the ideological and political struggles now gripping France, Italy, Greece, Czechoslovakia—and, on the other side of the world, China and Japan?

For those thinking people who see the real significance of America's new position in world affairs, for those thinking people who realize their responsibilities and recognize their opportunities, for those who really want to know what is going on beyond their own boundaries, WORLD REPORT is now being published.

WORLD REPORT concentrates on world developments exclusively.

WORLD REPORT pushes back the horizons of your world so that your horizons correspond with America's new horizons.

We honestly believe that you will find WORLD REPORT the most informative magazine you read, that with it you will learn more in less time than you can from any of your other reading. We can make that statement, conservatively, first because WORLD REPORT is that kind of a newsmagazine; secondly, because there is so much to learn and to understand about world developments before any of us can look upon ourselves as being well-informed.

. . . an American salesman in France.

. . . a world of rebuilding.

. . . magic carpet . . . to world markets.

the easy way to keep up with the world

How does WORLD REPORT, the enemy of shallow "headline" knowledge of world news and events, do its job for you? How does WORLD REPORT make it easy for you to keep up with the world—and keep ahead of it in many instances?

Let's take one weekly issue, and see.

First, WORLD REPORT gives you a quick look at world business: what has happened, what's ahead, how it will affect us.

Second, WORLD REPORT keeps you posted on world reconstruction—the size and nature of the job to be done, the new markets to be opened up for our goods.

Third, with WORLD REPORT, you visit Russia, England, Latin America, the Far East —for behind-the-scenes reports on what's happening inside governments, the conflicts of personality or policy, the clashes of factions and interests. You have a ringside seat at all the goings-on in world intrigue, diplomacy, propaganda—and WORLD REPORT cuts through the partial truths and untruths, to bring you the whole truth.

Fourth, each week WORLD REPORT gives you the abc's of some important situation affecting the economic trends of the world—and gives it to you so well and so simply that you'll not only understand it yourself, but—the real test—you'll be able to explain it to others.

Fifth—and this may well be one of the first things you notice about WORLD REPORT—you get an interesting story in pictures, pictures that tell a story rather than simply adorn a page. For WORLD REPORT is published by the same organization which "invented" and perfected the Pictogram—the ultimate of the proverb that "a picture is worth 10,000 words."

Sixth—like a good pilot briefing his crew before flight, WORLD REPORT is as much concerned with what is going to happen as with what is happening now. In analyzing each important development, WORLD REPORT takes a look back, a look at the present, and a look at the future—because all three dimensions are important to a clear understanding of what is going on in the world. Emphasis is on the net result, the impact of each development on the nation or nations involved, and on the various groups which are affected within those nations—the businessmen, the political parties, the people themselves. This new kind of reporting we call the newsreport—news with a third dimension. Nowhere else will you find so much in so little space.

Seventh, WORLD REPORT keeps you in touch with what is being done to win the peace—in general, and with specific reference to the United Nations and its work to prevent another war. High-sounding and multisyllabic words are boiled down to terms of how much or how little is really being accomplished.

Eighth, WORLD REPORT tells you what's what in foreign trade—the supplies and movements of world commodities, news and developments in world shipping and aviation—covering all the factors that can conceivably mean more production and greater employment.

Ninth, realizing that just as the actions of our own government have come to have great influence on our daily lives, so the actions of other governments will increasingly affect us, WORLD REPORT pays close attention to new regulations, new restrictions, new legislation abroad which have a bearing on what we buy or sell, and how much we pay or get paid for it.

Tenth, WORLD REPORT concerns itself with and points out to you trends: in thought, in feelings, in politics—so that in many cases you know what the next development is going to be long before it happens, and can therefore condition your thoughts and your actions accordingly.

Finally, WORLD REPORT doesn't clutter up its pages and your mind with a superficial recounting or mere review of all the news from abroad. It concentrates rather on the important, the essential in an understanding of foreign affairs.

WORLD REPORT is the product of a staff skilled in digging the meaning out of words and events, skilled in uncovering the elusive keys to complete grasp and understanding, skilled in saving your time by being able to say more in fewer words than any other group in the country. WORLD REPORT is for busy people who must keep up with a busy world.

HOW WORLD REPORT IS QUALIFIED TO DO THIS UNIQUE JOB FOR YOU

In a world shrinking so fast you can hardly keep up with it, to whom are you going to entrust the job of analyzing and interpreting world developments for you? You know that you must be careful about your choice, for nowhere else is there so much room for bias, color and unfounded opinions as there is in the field of world news—and above all else you want unbiased, dependable information.

We bid for your confidence on the basis of the record of dependability and accuracy of The United States News—for WORLD REPORT is published by the same organization. In the last twelve years The United States News has done its job of reporting and forecasting national developments so well that its weekly circulation has grown from 18,000 to more than 250,000 and "official Washington" now votes it the most important magazine published.

Under the same sponsorship and direction, and with the benefit of all of The United States News' experience, WORLD REPORT has gathered what we believe to be the most talented group of editors, specialists, investigators, economists and reporters ever to devote themselves to world affairs exclusively on any publication. This experienced staff, located in the strategic centers throughout the world, gives you the benefit of first-hand information on world developments.

WORLD REPORT has no axe to grind, espouses no cause, expresses no editorial opinion—confident that its readers are fully competent to make up their own minds when supplied with the true facts and information. WORLD REPORT gives you the facts objectively, without regard to whom it helps or hurts.

An Appeal for "A Higher Realism"

A YEAR has passed since the founding of this Committee and the publication of our first appeal to reason in the face of the overwhelming threat presented to civilization by the atomic bomb. During this year our hopes for international agreement on control of atomic energy have come to nothing. It is imperative that the American people understand this failure if any constructive solutions are to be arrived at in time.

Can thoughtful and well-informed men any longer expect fruitful agreements to come out of the discussions now going on in the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission? Are the American proposals for the international control of atomic energy fair? Are the Russians to blame that any agreement is further away than at the initiation of the discussions?

These are questions of varying degrees of importance but the imperative question, the answer to which is a matter of historic necessity, is: "How can we reach a world consensus to abolish in the near future the threat of atomic war, and ultimately, the possibility of war itself?" If we fail to find the answer to this question, the answer to any other question is irrelevant.

All signs indicate that we are failing to meet the challenge. Peoples throughout the world want peace as never before, yet nations prepare feverishly for war. Preparation goes on day and night on both the material and psychological planes. Instead of the "One World" which men proclaimed a few short years ago, we have come even to the partition of existing nations. The United Nations, in which was invested the hopes of peoples throughout the world, is granted inadequate powers and, indeed, this tribunal is bypassed on matters of primary importance. Militarism is rampant throughout the world. In all history, never in any period of "peace" have so many men been under arms. Even in Great Britain and America with their great anti-militarist traditions, liberal-thinking men, considering the necessities of the situation, turn to the "realistic" solution. The Prussian disease of which the German and Japanese states have died is beginning to infect the conquerors.

EVENTS during the past year have emphasized the tragic pertinence of our Six Point statement published on November 17, 1946:

1. Atomic bombs can now be made cheaply and in large number. They will become more destructive.
2. There is no military defense against atomic bombs and none is to be expected.
3. Other nations can rediscover our secret processes by themselves.
4. Preparedness against atomic war is futile, and if attempted will ruin the structure of our social order.
5. If war breaks out, atomic bombs will be used and they will surely destroy our civilization.
6. There is no solution to this problem except international control of atomic energy and, ultimately, the elimination of war.

Once stock piles of atomic bombs have been accumulated by two national blocs of a divided world, it will no longer be possible to maintain peace. Thus we have one year less to secure a workable solution to safeguard our civilization.

Why have the year-long discussions in the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission not succeeded? Is this because of incidental and transitory factors which can be remedied by simple measures such as, for instance, the appointment of new personnel to carry on the discussions? The answer is in the negative. The representatives of great states while striving to safeguard the peace, have fulfilled their traditional duty to place their own nations in the most advantageous position to win the next war. It is useless to proceed further along this path; one cannot prepare for war and expect peace.

This is not to say that war is inevitable. It is to say, however, that the discussions now under way may not make a war less likely, and in fact are based upon the premise of an anticipated war. What is necessary at this critical time is to determine whether there remains an alternative approach more likely to achieve peaceful solutions.

We believe that there is such an alternative approach. We believe that the problem of atomic energy can no longer be treated as an isolated issue. We had hoped a year ago to achieve a pattern of international control of atomic energy which could be applied to other spheres of international concern to implement the creation of a stable world society. To foster this hope today as we move into a world divided into two armed camps would be a betrayal of our responsibility.

We believe that the imperative problem of international control of atomic energy must be solved and can only be solved within the context of a general agreement which guarantees a reasonable degree of security to all nations and provides for far-reaching economic and cultural cooperation among nations. Such a settlement is not possible if the respective peoples are concerned exclusively with the security and welfare of their own countries.

BECAUSE of the importance of the United States in the world today it is imperative that the American people take an active part in achieving such a world settlement. America must be prepared to mobilize her vast resources on an adequate scale to help the peoples of the world lift the levels of their economic life. All peoples would be expected to make reciprocal sacrifices to achieve great ends. Only bold measures of this kind can produce an atmosphere between nations which makes it possible to discuss constructively the restrictions on national sovereignty necessary to the preservation of peace.

But the American people should understand that there is no easy path to the accomplishment of these great objectives; that, in the long run, the creation of a supranational government, with powers adequate to the responsibility of maintaining the peace, is necessary.

Is this realistic? We believe that nothing less is realistic. We know that the developments of science and technology have determined that the peoples of the world are no longer able to live under competing national sovereignties with war as the ultimate arbitrator. Men must understand that the times demand a higher realism which recognizes that "no man is an island," that our fate is joined with that of our fellowmen throughout the world. We must contrive to live together in peace even if at the cost of great material sacrifice; the alternative is the death of our society. As we approach what may be the last hour before midnight, the challenge is plain before us. What will be our response?

THE EMERGENCY COMMITTEE OF ATOMIC SCIENTISTS

INCORPORATED

90 NASSAU STREET, PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY

THE Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists was organized informally in May, 1946 by a small group of atomic scientists headed by Albert Einstein and Harold C. Urey; the Committee was incorporated in August, 1946. The atomic scientists understood, because of their unique knowledge, the tremendous new problems which faced mankind through the release of atomic energy. Their purpose in coming together was to arouse the American people to an understanding of the unprecedented crisis in national and international affairs precipitated by the atomic discoveries.

The part they had borne in these discoveries had aroused in scientists a deep sense of responsibility for the immediate and eventual uses to which this great new power might be put. As scientists, working in the interests of their country at a time of national peril, they had released overwhelming new forces. As citizens, they saw that the people were wholly unaware of the supreme implications of this new power, mainly because of the necessity of military security. They believed that the connotations of secrecy, national rivalry, and mass destruction that unavoidably attached to the atomic discoveries from their inception must be removed, that men might determine the future use and control of atomic energy in an atmosphere of free and democratic discussion.

During the year that has passed, every member of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists has done his utmost to bring home to the people of the United States the simple facts of atomic energy and their tremendous implications for world peace or world destruction. By conference and letter this small group of men have reached directly over 200,000 key citizens. To reach a wider audience, they have the willing cooperation of hundreds of younger scientists who, forming themselves into the Association of Scientists for Atomic Education, have sent out teams of speakers to bring to large cities and small towns in simple concrete terms the facts of atomic energy. They have already worked in ten states: California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kansas, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia.

Their work is complemented by the nationwide educational effort of the National Committee on Atomic Information, likewise formed at the urgent behest of leading atomic scientists. This group is an association of more than sixty organizations, representing a total nationwide membership of over forty million people, all of whom can be reached through the normal communication channels of their particular organization. The work of the Association of Scientists for Atomic Education and the National Committee on Atomic Information is financed by the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists.

Also financed by the Committee is the uniquely valuable Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, which month by month presents and appraises every important proposal for international control, whether emanating from government or private sources. The Bulletin is perhaps the most valuable existing medium for disseminating information and opinion on atomic energy control. It reaches those who are responsible for governmental policy both in the United States and abroad, carrying to them the thoughtful conclusions of the world's leading atomic scientists.

In the year that has passed since the founding of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists, there have been significant indications of a growing understanding and concern for the proper democratic safeguarding of atomic energy. The adoption of the McMahon Bill, providing for civilian control of atomic energy, was such an indication; the publication of the Acheson-Lilienthal Report was another. But the deadlock that has recently been reached in international control negotiations has produced a climate of general doubt and uncertainty, a state of mind in which ill-considered, inadequate and dangerous proposals can flourish. To the end that the American people may fully understand the fundamental requirements of any satisfactory and workable international agreement for the control of atomic energy, the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists proposes a strengthening and enlargement of its educational work.

To date over 10,000 private individuals have subscribed to this educational effort in the interest of national and world understanding of the momentous issues at stake. Over $85,000 was received in response to the scientists' first urgent appeal. Since the formal incorporation of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists, an additional $235,000 has been contributed. Fully to implement its educational campaign the Committee seeks a minimum total of $1,000,000.

It is the unanimous belief of the members of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists that such a nationwide educational campaign provides the only assurance that public attention will be focused on the paramount necessity of securing effective international control to safeguard our civilization.

SOUTH AFRICA GETS $1,400,000 LEND-LEASE SURPLUS FROM U. S.

The intricate financial relations between the U. S. of A. and U. of S. A. on the government level have been brought into prominence by recent lend-lease settlements which indicate clearly the extent to which this government is propping up South Africa's shaky economy.

Back in 1944 Smuts told his parliament that the British would foot the bill for lend-lease supplies sent South Africa. "We have no direcet obligation," he said. "The British government has taken everything on its own shoulders."

It therefore came as quite a shock to South Africa when the U. S. last August handed the government there a lend lease bill amounting to about $900,000,000. The Cape Times (Cape Town), reflected the popular attitude in a cartoon representing Uncle Sam in the guise of a Shylock saying, "What's wrong, I'm entitled to my pound of flesh, ain't I?"

South Africa offered to settle for $44.-000,000, a token payment. Agreement was finally reached this year on a payment of $100,000,000, after Smuts himself had been over here to intercede. Considerable fanfare attended the payment of the first half of this amount in March. (Remember how little Findland paid its World War I debt?)

No such publicity was given one important part of the settlement whereby $1,400,000 worth of American lend-lease equipment in the Union (not counting other military stores there previously bought) was sold to the Union government on the condition that payment not be made in U. S. dollars but in South African pounds which would be spent by the U. S. government in South Africa.

And so Uncle Sam isn't such a Shylock after all. This little deal merits some attention by those investigating the disposal of surplus war supplies.

Meantime shipments of gold bullion from South Africa, product of the blood and sweat of black labor, continue to arrive in this country. Early last month a single cargo of $10,000,000 in gold arrived from Cape Town consigned to the Federal Reserve Bank in Manhattan.

Basuto People Plan Delegation To Next U. N. Assembly Meeting

Another fresh cause of worry to both the British and South African governments is looming up at the next meeting of the U. N. General Assembly in September. A delegation representing the 560,000 people of Basutoland will attend that meeting to bring to the attention of the delegates the "violation of agreement of protection and rights of the Basuto people by England."

This decision was unanimously agreed upon by people's and chief's representatives from all parts of Basutoland at a conference held in April at Mapoteng, called by the Basuto nationalist movement, Lekhotla le Bafo.

Basutoland is one of the three colonies under British rule contiguous to the Union of South Africa and long coveted by the government of the latter country. (New Africa, Sept. 1946, told how Chief Tshekedi Khama was prevented by the British government from bringing a petition to the U. N. from the people of Bechuanaland, another of the three colonies.)

Josiel Lefele, one of the most respected leaders of Lekhotla le Bafo and a member of the Basutoland General Council, made a three and a half hour address in which he traced the history of the colony and the violation of the treaty of alliance signed by King Moshesh and Queen Victoria which guaranteed internal self-government of the Basuto people.

He warned that the British government was paving the way for the annexation of their country by the Union of South Africa.

Lekhotla le Bafo has previously appealed to the General Secretary of the U. N. against the ban placed on its activities by the British government. In 1942 Josiel Lefela and two other leaders of the organization were interned by the government for making the demand that Basuto soldiers be given full military training and arms in order to be able to defend their country and fight against fascism. This was regarded as seditious—in the three protectorates as well as South Africa recruits were used only in non-combat services.

Welcome to Azikiwe

The Council on African Affairs joins in welcoming West Africa's great leader, Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, who arrived in the United States May 21 for a short visit.

Dr. Azikiwe is the owner and publisher of five newspapers in Nigeria, including the militant WEST AFRICAN PILOT. Because of the tremendous influence of these papers in the fight for democratic rights of Africans, Azikiwe is a marked man among British officialdom. Three of his papers were temporarily banned by the Governor because of the strong support given the 1945 general strike in Nigeria. The Council made formal protest against this and other instances of official persecution against Azikiwe.

Dr. Azikiwe

On the death of Herbert Macaulay last May, Azikiwe inherited the leadership of the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons, a powerful federation of organizations throughout the country. Just this year he won the largest vote among the three Lagos members elected to Nigeria's Legislative Council.

Azikiwe received his higher education in this country at Storer College, West Virginia; Lincoln University and Pennsylvania and Columbia Universities. Last year he received the degree of Doctor of Laws from Lincoln. This year he received an honorary doctorat of literature from Storer College and made the commencement address at that institution on June 2nd.

Next month Azikiwe will go to England to head a delegation of the National Council of Nigeria which will place the demands of Nigerians before the British public and government. Immediate demands include changes in the constitution to grant more representative government and revision of ordinances relating to land rights, minerals, and the status of chiefs.

Azikiwe believes Nigeria should have the right of self-determination after 15 years, during which time certain preparatory stages of development toward full self-government should be completed.

Indian-South African Relations "Have Deteriorated Further", Nehru Tells Smuts

THE Indian government on June 3 made public the contents of letters from Pandit Nehru to Field Marshal Smuts expressing the Indian government's desire for steps to be taken in accordance with the U. N. General Assembly resolution on the treatment of Indians in South Africa, and indicating the unreadiness of the Government to agree to the return to South Africa of the High Commissioner for India, as requested by Smuts, until Indian-South African relations improve.

Copies of the letters, dated April 24 and May 6, were sent simultaneously to Trygve Lie, U. N. Secretary General.

Smuts replied to the first letter, stating that negotiations on the question at issue could best be carried out if the High Commissioner for India should return to South Africa and confer with Union authorities. Replying on May 6, Nehru said that his government did not regard the absence of the High Commissioner from the Union as in any way hindering solution of the question.

He pointed out that the High Commissioner had been recalled "as a consequence of the deterioration in relations between our two countries of which the General Assembly of the United Nations has taken note. The India Government have to state with regret that these relations have not only not improved since but have deteriorated further."

Up to June 3 Smuts had not replied to Nehru's letter of May 6.

U. N. Vetoes U. S. Discrimination

Hearty congratulations to Byron Price, U. N. Assistant Secretary General in charge of Administrative Affairs, for refusing to sanction disrimination by the Metropolitan and New York Life Insurance Companies in housing accomodations for U. N. employees. Mr. Price cancelled rental agreements between the United Nations and the corporations involving 912 apartments when the companies insisted upon the right of excluding employees it regarded as "unsuitable" as tenants.

New York citizens have waged a long fight against the discriminatory policy of the giant insurance companies.

It is to be hoped, as Dr. Yergan stated in his letter of congratulation to Mr. Price, that the action of the U. N. Secretariat in giving concrete implementation to the U. N. principle of racial equality, will set a precedent for democratic hospitality instead of Jim Crow insults to dark-skinned U. N. delegates as well as staff members coming to America.

1,698 SENTENCED TO JAIL IN INDIAN RESISTANCE CAMPAIGN

Up to May, according to The Passive Resister, published by the Indian Natal Congress, 1,698 people had been sentenced and jailed since the passive resistance campaign began last June in protest against the South African government's discriminatory housing and land legislation aimed at the Indian minority.

The figure of 1698 includes 275 women. The prisoners, among whom have been Africans, have served a total of 181 years, 10 months, 3 wekes in jail, it was estimated.

Racial antagonism has been aggravated by the campaign organized in the Transvaal Province by white farmers to boycott Indian traders. The boycott movement has developed into a widespread scheme to drive Indians entirely out of business throught the whole of South Africa.

A few of the wealthier Indians have attempted to find a basis of compromise which would save the South African government from further embarrassment. These compromisers, who met recently with General Smuts, are called Indian "moderates" in the South African European press and in press dispatches to papers like the New York Times. But the leaders of the passive resistance movement call them Quislings, "puppets of General Smuts."

SOUTH AFRICA'S GREATEST DEMONSTRATION OF AFRICAN-INDIAN COOPERATION: Part of the throng at the Unity Rally in Johannesburg May 4, organized jointly by the African National Congress, Transvaal Indian Congress, and Transvaal Branch of the African People's Organization. Dr. Xuma, Senator Basner and other speakers denounced Smuts' failure to carry out the United Nations decisions on South West Africa and Indian discrimination. Greetings from Paul Robeson, Chairman, Council on Africa Affairs, were read and warmly applauded.

Colonial Powers Emphasized Own Prerogatives At First Session of U. N. Trusteeship Council

A GOOD clew to the net result of the first session of the U. N. Trusteeship Council March 26 to April 28, is the statement of the British delegate, Mr. Ivor Thomas, when interviewed by Commonweal. He was somewhat more optimistic about the future of the trusteeship system than he had been at the close of the General Assembly session last December. The members of the Trusteeship Council, he said, "worked as a team," whereas during the General Assembly meeting, the administering powers had been the victims of what he called ignorant and abusive attack.

Contrary to the observation of Mr. Thomas, there was considerable opposition from the three non-colonial members of the T. C. (China, Mexico and Iraq) to the position taken by the administering powers on many of the points under discussion. But the six colonial powers on the T.C. (Britain, France, U.S.A., Belgium, Australia and New Zealand) ordered things pretty much as they pleased. The absence of the Soviet Union from the session made it difficult for the non-colonial minority to present a very effective opposition. Sharp criticism of some of the decisions made is expected when the report of the T. C. comes before the General Assembly.

As an indication of the general tenor of the session, one may cite the following matters of record:

• The colonial powers were firmly opposed to letting the Secretariat of U. N. use the slghtest initiative in dealing with trusteeship matters. For example, the T. C. voted 5-4 that in circulating any petition the Secretary-General should give no background information or comments from any source unless the comments of the administering authority concerned were available at that time.

• There was opposition to acknowledging that the General Assembly or the Security Council might call special sessions of the T. C. The New Zealand representative, for instance, declared that the T. C. "should maintain a position of independence" and be "in no way subordinate to the Security Council." The Charter's provisions on this matter, however, could not be ignored. But a Chinese proposal that special sessions should also be called "upon the petition of the inhabitants of the trust territories with the approval of the majority of members of the T. C." was not adopted in the rules of procedure.

• The same jealous attitude was evident in the decisions on relations of the T.C. to other U. N. agencies. A proposal that representatives of such agencies be permitted to propose resoluions or amendments to the T. C. but not vote on them, was rejected. The Belgian representative wanted the Economic and Social Council in matters relating to trust territories to deal directly with the administering authorities rather than with the T. C., emphasizing that the T. C. was "only an organ for supervision and not for direct administration."

• The attempt was made to enable administering powers to screen petitions from inhabitants of the trust territories addressed to the U. N. It was decided to allow three months between the time of receipt of a petition and the review of it before the T. C. The state concerned could in the meantime report that the grievance had been satisfactorily resolved.

• The colonial powers made a strong fight to virtually nullify the power of oral petition, one suggestion being that all such petitions be honored only if they had previously been submitted in writing. The drafting committee adopted the view that oral petitions should be regarded as "exceptional" and should be preceded by notice of their subject matter by the petitioners.

• On the matter of the questionnaires to be answered by states holding trust territories, the states concerned objected to the request for "comprehensive and detailed" information. The Belgian representative, supported by the British, made an effort to get adoption of the inadequate questionnaire drafted twenty years ago and used by the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations.

• The T. C., by majority vote, decided that the administering powers, in answering questionnaries, should not be called upon to disclose information of international concern about armed forces and military bases in the trust territories. (The right to establish such bases without consent of the Security Council was one of the most hotly debated points at the last Assembly meeting.)

At its first session the Trusteeship Council:

• Adopted 107 rules of procedure, including provision for two regular sessions annually in June and November.

• Approved provisionally the questionnaire to be sent to states administering trust territories, the final decision to be made at the November session after consultation with specialized U. N. agencies.

• Established an investigating mission consisting of Belgium, Iraq and the U. S. to go to Western Samoa this summer in response to the petitions of the inhabitants of that New Zealand-governed territory for self-government.

• Reviewed petitions from Germans and Italians in British-administered Tanganyika asking the prevention of repatriation of the petitioners to their countries of origin; the T. C. decided not to intervene, leaving the matter in the hands of the British.

• Postponed for consideration until the November session petitions from the General Secretary of the All-Ewe Conference relating to British and French Togoland, protesting the division of the Ewe people between the two administrations and demanding unification followng a plebiscite.

News Notes

NAIROBI, KENYA—The U. N. committee on freedom of the press will please note: In Nairobi last month the publisher and editor of the only Indian-owned and African-edited weekly newspaper, Habari, were convicted of sedition and sentenced to jail because of publication of a letter written by an African soldier complaining against the European treatment of Africans. Also last month, the publisher and editor of the Umma newspaper in Khartoum were fined for allegedly attempting to "incite feelings of dissatisfaction" against the government of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan.

•

SOUTHERN RHODESIA—A resolution that the African branch of the Southern Rhodesia Labor Party should be disbanded was defeated at the annual congress of the party in April. The Trades and Labor Council of Rhodesia also went on record in support of African trade unions and proposed that the Industrial Conciliation Act which excludes Africans (as in South Africa) should be amended to give recogcognition to them.

•

WASHINGTON—The question of the disposition of the Italian colonies is again in the news. The U.S. State Dept. has emphasized that the Big Four conference to be held soon on this problem should be regarded simply as a preliminary meeting for the purpose of arranging for a commission of investigation to be sent to the Italian colonies to ascertain the views of the local population and secure other pertinent information. Meanwhile the former Italian colonies remain under British military rule.

•

ETHIOPIA—Two Sudanese doctors, graduates of the Kitchener Medical College at Khartoum, have arrived in Addis Ababa to serve with the Ethiopian Ministry of Public Health.

•

NIGERIA — The Secretary General of the Nigerian Union of Teachers, E. E. Esua, announced that a deadline of May 14th had been set for a teachers' strike in the event the government had not by that time arrived at a satisfactory decision with respect to improvement of salaries and other grievances of teachers.

PARIS—French, British and Belgian colonial officials and experts held a 3-day conference here last month and agreed to cooperate more closely in certain common matters of administration of their African colonies. Problems of health, food, labor conditions and soil conservation will henceforth be considered jointly by representatives of the three nations at periodic conferences to be held in Africa.

•

CAPETOWN, SOUTH AFRICA — Considerable excitement was stirred up in the House of Assembly not long ago when, for the first time, General Smuts referred to the African people as "Africans." "Why don't you call them 'natives'? That's their name," called out one member.

"Have you fallen for Communist propaganda?" shouted another.

"I cannot see anything wrong in calling a people by the name they prefer," General Smuts replied. Then he added, smiling: "I am an African as well."

The Natives' Representatives (white) in the House, who always refer to "Africans," still meet with Nationalist objections almost every time they use the word.

Government Cracks Down On South African Labor Unity

Coincident with noteworthy action by the South African Trades and Labor Council at its recent annual conference cementing ties between white and non-white workers (of which more below), General Smuts began talking about the desirability of separating African and Colored Workers from the general labor movement in their own unions.

Following this, an Industrial Conciliation (Natives) Bill was drafted for consideration in the Union parliament. Officials speak of the bill as answering the long heard demand for official recognition of African trade unions, BUT—

- It would bar strikes by those unions. There would be compulsory arbitration of all disputes by officially appointed boards. Thus the unions would be no better off than they are now.
- It would not permit union organization of the hundreds of thousands of workers in the mining industry and in farming and domestic service. Thus only a minority of the employed Africans would have "recognized" unions.

African leaders naturally oppose this phony recognition of their trade unions. The African National Congress has declared that the proposed bill "is unacceptable because it maintains the principle of racial discrimination and domination."

Labor Conference Action

Now, let's look at the other side of the picture—which explains the reason for the government's bill. At the annual conference of the South African Trades and Labor Council held in April, a demand for the exclusion of non-European workers was defeated. Further, the conference by majority vote condemned the police brutality against the African mine workers during their strike of last August and repudiated the Council's Executive Committee for justifying that police brutality in a cabled message to the W.F.T.U.

It should be noted that the S.A.T.L.C. is a federation of predominantly white workers. Of the 117 affiliated trade unions, representing 168,000 members, 68 have some non-white members. Of the 170 delegates attending the conference, only 30 were non-white.

Writing on the African representation in S.A.T.L.C. and the conference action on this question, H. A. Naidoo, an Indian delegate to the Conference, who visited the United States last fall during the meeting of the U. N., says:

"A large number of African trade unions are still excluded from affiliation by reason of their inability to meet their financial obligations . . . although the Council has no color bar, many non-European members are prevented from exercising their influence in it.

"Despite these difficulties, there is an increasing sign that non-European workers are bound to play their full part in the S.A.T.L.C.

"With the increasing participation of Non-European workers in the S.A.T.L.C. there has been a growing demand for their exclusion. In recent years this demand has come mainly from unions which have come under the grip of fascist influence.

'At the last Conference this demand for excluding non-European workers took the form of a resolution seeking to amend the constitution by providing that only unions registered under the Industrial Conciliation Act shall become members of the Council.

"Clearly this was an attempt to exclude African workers, who are not recognized under the Industrial Conciliation Act. When put to the vote, the motion was defeated by 30 to 115. The card vote which was called for gave the following result: 36,373 voting in favor and 88,497 voting against, thus revealing an equally significant majority against this reactionary demand.

'After the defeat of this fascist-inspired resolution, nine delegates representing only 2,929 workers walked out of the Conference. The daily press seized the opportunity to report the incident as causing a 'split' in the S.A.T.L.C., although, as can be seen by the figures given above, the dissenting unions represented less than 2 per cent of the affiliated membership."

Smuts Rebuffed in Plea to Natives Representative Council

General Smuts met last month with six members of the Natives' Representative Council, whose members voted to adjourn sine die last August because their recommendations to the government were completely ignored.

The Prime Minister was in a conciliatory mood. He acknowledged that the N.R.C., established in 1936, had been given no responsibility and that it was merely a debating chamber whose resolutions fell on deaf ears. He recognized the dissatisfaction and frustration felt by the members but hoped that the Council would resume its functions.

"I think the time has come," Smuts said, "to place a measure of responsibility on the Natives Representative Council. Some executive authority must be given it. I should like to give the Council a bone to chew."

The Africans' attitude to the Prime Minister's tentative proposals (which appear to be designed to strengthen his position at the next meeting of the U. N. General Assembly) was expressed by the working committee of the African National Congress headed by Dr. A. B. Xuma. That body described the proposals as "vague and disappointing" and said:

"The Prime Minister seems to have sidestepped the main cause of the deadlock—the demand of the Natives Representative Council for the repeal of discriminatory colour legislation against Africans and the Council's consequent resolution to adjourn indefinitely until such demands have been complied with.

"The proposals in fact are a retrogressive step in that as long as present discriminatory legislation remains on the statute book the Africans are in effect asked by the Prime Minister in his proposals to administer their own domination, discrimination and oppression under the cloak of giving them responsibility and participation in the administration of their own affairs.

"In other words, we do not accept any proposal that does not provide for direct representation of all sections of the community in all legislative bodies."

3,000 Kenya Africans Petition Government

One of the largest meetings of Africans ever held in East Africa took place on April 20th in Nairobi, Kenya, sponsored by the Kenya African Union. Over 3,000 men and women were present. E. W. Mathu and B. A. Ohanga, African members appointed to the Kenya Legislative Council, and Jomo Kenyatta, author of "Facing Mount Kenya," were among the principal spakers.

Political activity among both Indians and Africans in British East Africa has recently risen sharply as a result of the government's plan for the reorganization of inter-territorial services and establishment of a central legislative assembly for Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika.

E. W. Mathu

In all three colonies the legislatures with their white and official majorities approved the proposals over the united opposition of Indian, Arab and African members who protested against the British government's abandonment of the principle of equal racial representation. The East African Indian National Congress has been active in bringing this question to the attention of all non-white peoples in East Africa and a joint Indo-African deputation is scheduled to take their protest to London.

It was against this background that the meeting on April 20 was held in Nairobi. The audience fully endorsed the stand taken by the African members of the Legislative Council in voting against the inter-territorial scheme. The meeting also declared that:

- The political objective of the African in Kenya must be self-government by Africans for Africans, and that in that African state the rights of all minorities would be safeguarded.
- More African seats should be provided at once in the Kenya Legislative Council.
- More land must be made available both in the Crownland and in the Highlands for the settlement of Africans.
- The introduction of compulsory and free education for Africans, as is given to the children of other races, is overdue.
- Abolition of the Kipande (registration certificates) and pass laws is essential.
- A Royal Commission, like the Caribean Commission, should be sent to Kenya.
- In view of the recent strikes in Mombasa, Kisumu, Kisii, Maseno and Asembo Bay, the government should take action at once to substantially improve wages, housing and other conditions of African labor and provide equal pay for equal work.

Dear Mr. Mitchel:

I am writing today to you and other friends who have helped us during the past year. It is a difficult moment at which to write. All about us we see the wreckage of great hopes which mankind held for the building of peace. The gulf between East and West which men of good will have worked to close is widening daily. Some people believe that no reconciliation is possible and that another World War must decide the issue; we scientists reply that it is no longer possible to decide any issue by such means - an atomic war will bring no real decision but only unprecedented death and devastation on both sides.

Such a time in history breeds defeatism and despair. But there are those among us who believe that man has within him the capacity to meet and overcome even the great tests of our times. What we must not lose, or we lose all, is our willingness to seek the truth and our courage to act upon the truth. If we maintain these, we cannot despair.

We scientists believe upon ample evidence that the time of decision is upon us - that what we do or fail to do within the next few years will determine the fate of our civilization. That is the gist of the enclosed statement of this Committee which was published on June 30th, 1947. We call for a "higher realism which recognizes that.....our fate is joined with that of our fellowmen throughout the world." Great ideas may often be expressed in very simple words. In the shadow of the atomic bomb it has become apparent that all men are brothers. If we recognize this as truth and act upon this recognition, mankind may go forward to a higher plane of human development. If the angry passions of a nationalistic world engulf us further, we are doomed.

The task of the scientists, as we conceive it, is untiringly to explain these truths, so that the American people will understand all that is at stake. We believe that with such understanding, the American people will choose from among many paths to reach a peaceful solution and that they will move toward such a solution and not toward war. And we believe that, in the long run, security for all nations demands a supra-national solution.

We will strive unceasingly to bring this understanding to the American people through all the avenues of public discussion open to us. If we are to have any hope of influencing the Russians, and of convincing them that America wants peace and security for all peoples, we must understand the reasons for their profound distrust of everything foreign which has become the sickness of a stubborn isolationism. We will work for understanding, not abject appeasement.

This letter goes to you on the second anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima. On that day the American people assumed responsibility before the world for the release of the most revolutionary force since the discovery of fire. Each of us, whether as scientists who made the bomb possible, or as citizens of the nation that applied the knowledge, stands accountable for the use we make of this tremendous new force. To our generation has come the possibility of making the most fateful decision in the recorded history of the human race. By an act of the collective will, made now, in this fraction of historic time, we can ensure that this great and painful achievement of man's intellect, instead of turning upon humanity, may be secured for the benefit of future generations. I believe that mankind, capable of reason, restraint, and courage, will choose this path of peace.

No one can predict the events of the coming year but each of us has it in his power today to act for peace. You have helped us in the past. I ask you to help again.

Faithfully yours,

A. Einstein.

Statement of the Lake Geneva Conference of Scientists

Adopted June 21, 1947

The following Statement was adopted at a special meeting of scientists from every section of the country held at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, June 18-22, 1947. The Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists endorses this Statement, and will contribute its utmost to achieve the indicated objectives.

I

As scientists, we possess a professional knowledge of the developments of science, and in particular, of the peaceful and military possibilities of atomic energy, with its great consequences for good and bad.

The universal character of science, which has created a world-wide scientific community implies to us the probability of discoveries of the same scope in other parts of the world.

We believe that our knowledge imposes on us the responsibility of providing our fellow countrymen and the world with information necessary for charting a wise policy.

The tradition of science involves the seeking of relevant facts and the testing of conclusions in the light of these facts. We believe that by communicating this attitude of science to our people and their leaders we may assist in some measure in the solution of the political problems which have arisen and will continue to arise from the advance of science and technology.

II

We believe that the difficulties encountered in the present attempts to arrive at an agreement on international control of atomic energy do not relieve us of our responsibility but make it all the more urgent.

We therefore reaffirm the following as our special responsibilities:

1. We will continue to make clear that the American monopoly of the atomic bomb is temporary, that there is no "secret" of the atomic bomb, and that there will be no defense which could save this country from ruin in a war with the new weapons of mass destruction.

2. We will continue to urge the establishment of an effective international agency for the control of atomic energy. We believe that control based on cooperative development of atomic energy offers the greatest hope for the future and that such control can and should be established without impairing the diverse economies of the individual nations.

3. We will work toward the extension and international distribution of the peacetime benefits of atomic energy, particularly those which will come from the application of new tools of research.

4. We will continue to point out the dangers to the progress of science, the freedom of scientists, and the civil liberties of citizens which arise from military control of science or its subordination to military aims.

We believe that scientific and technical considerations are becoming increasingly important in the determination of American policies, and we propose to appraise such policies on the basis of the attitude and information held by scientists.

III

The progress of present plans to avoid an atomic armaments race has been slow and uncertain. Consideration of alternatives and the possibilities of merging the present plans in more comprehensive schemes of world cooperation has become necessary.

Unless agreement on some plan embodying effective international control of atomic energy is reached, an atomic armaments race will become unavoidable. It will inevitably bring pressure for the United States to embark on a "preventive" war. Such a preventive war would be an act of aggression and would not be justified on moral grounds. It would entail a bitter struggle, enormously costly in life and property, with unpredictable risks for the United States.

IV

As scientists we claim no special competence in the fields of economics and international relations. We have come, however, to recognize during the last year that the problems of atomic energy cannot be dissociated from general progress toward cooperation among nations.

We recognize that our purpose—which is the permanent elimination of war—requires the establishment of a government of the world with powers adequate to maintain a peace based on the rule of law.

We believe it our obligation to join with other citizens in urging that the United States should participate actively in the development of instruments of world collaboration and use fully the agencies of the United Nations. We believe that it is urgent that the United States, which is the wealthiest nation in the world and has been little affected by the ravages of war, should make a great contribution, even at the cost of substantial sacrifice, to a program of world economic reconstruction under the auspices of the United Nations.

THE ATLANTIC REPORT on the World today

The Middle East

THE United Nations' handling of the Palestine question was one of the most heartening international developments since the war. The Special Committee, an impartially appointed instrument of world opinion, removed the most important aspects of the problem from the realm of controversy. Unanimously it recommended termination of the British Mandate and independence for Palestine. By a majority of seven to three it presented a plan for partition far removed in spirit and in detail from the "federation" scheme advanced last year by the British Cabinet. It also recommended that during the transition period the Mandatory Power be responsible for the admission of 150,000 immigrants into the proposed Jewish state and abolish the restrictions on land sales to Jews in that area.

Attempts to delay the UN Assembly's vote on the partition plan were frustrated by U.S.-Russian insistence on a decision, and the plan was carried thirty-three to thirteen, with ten abstentions. The only non-Moslem countries which voted against partition were Greece and Cuba.

The UN plan found the United States and Soviet Russia substantially in agreement for the first time on a major issue — an electrifying development that gave a sorely needed lift to the world organization. Furthermore, Gromyko's and Tsarapkin's surprise declarations in support of a Jewish state — made in the face of Arab threats to the West of a bolt into the Soviet camp — undercut the Arab League game of playing the powers off against each other and placed the whole Middle East situation in a more realistic perspective.

The outstanding stumbling block to a solution was Britain's refusal, despite its decision to evacuate Palestine, to coöperate in a settlement not acceptable to Arabs and Jews alike. This attitude came strangely from a government which had submitted the problem to the UN on the very ground that all possibilities of Arab-Jewish agreement had been exhausted; and which, furthermore, had shown no compunction about using force to impose the pro-Arab White Paper at great cost to itself in lives and money.

The United States and Russia achieved a compromise which asked no more of the Mandatory than to maintain order until evacuation and give to Arabs and Jews an equal opportunity to prepare for safeguarding their independence.

Will the Arabs go to war?

That there will be violence in Palestine is certain. But how much? Arab reluctance to make sacrifices to combat Zionism is a matter of record. Despite the tempest of speechmaking that greeted the 1936 Palestine riots, little was done to assist the insurgents, who at no time numbered more than 3000. The current Arab boycott of Zionist products has been so flagrantly violated that not long ago the Iraqui premier declared that only in Iraq was the boycott effective. It is no secret in the Middle East capitals that the Arab League meeting in Beirut, summoned in October to plan warfare against a Jewish state, degenerated into a contest between the Mufti and King Abdullah of Trans-Jordan for control of Palestine.

The long-standing feud between the Mufti and Abdullah — referred to as "Rabbi Abdullah" in the Mufti's Berlin broadcasts — is characteristic of the fissures within the Arab League. Abdullah for his part nurses a long-standing quarrel with Ibn Saud, who expelled Abdullah's father, King Husain, from the Hejaz in 1924.

Trans-Jordan and Iraq form a close partnership within the League by reason of family ties: the boy king of Iraq is Abdullah's grandnephew and the regent is his nephew. The two Hashemite (of the family of Husain) countries, while retaining separate rulers, plan to abolish customs barriers and to adopt a common currency and passport system as first steps toward a more ambitious program of federation — the so-called Greater Syria plan, one of the most explosive issues within the Arab world.

The plan is vehemently opposed by most Syrian politicians, who see their jobs endangered, and by the Christian majority in the Lebanon, which is fearful of being engulfed in a Moslem confederation. The latter have never forgotten the massacre of Assyrian Christians in Iraq after the First World War, and feel that their security is linked with that of the other large non-Moslem minority in the Arab world.

King Farouk of Egypt is a stanch upholder of the status quo, under which his country is the richest, the most populous, and the most highly industrialized of the Arab states. He and Ibn Saud heartily agree that Hashemite ambitions must be held in check, but their own relations are strained. In the eyes of Ibn Saud, leader of the Wahabites, the puritans of Islam, Farouk is a westernized young upstart who has the presumption to challenge his claim to Arab leadership.

The intensity of Arab rivalries makes it improbable that the Arab leaders will succeed in forging a military coalition. It is still less probable, should they go to war, that they could overcome the Hagana or Jewish Defense Force. Even as an illegal formation, the Hagana — estimated to be 70,000 to 80,000 strong — is a well-trained, well-equipped fighting force, officered by men who fought in the British Army, some with the Commandos. As the army of an independent Jewish state, its manpower could be appreciably enlarged and its equipment fortified by Palestine industry, which turned out considerable quantities of war material for the British.

Second-rate Arab Army

All the Arab armies together total approximately 135,000 men, a high proportion of whom must be kept at home to maintain order among the discontented masses and — in the case of Syria and Iraq — to cope with mutinous tribesmen. And this figure cannot be greatly strengthened by conscription. Eighty per cent of Egyptian recruits are rejected as physically unfit, and the health of the masses is, if anything, lower elsewhere.

The only first-class fighting units in the Arab world are the Trans-Jordan Arab Legion and the Trans-Jordan Frontier Force, both of which obey British orders; their involvement would be tantamount to British intervention. The Iraqui Army, strongest of the purely Arab forces, demonstrated its ineptitude both in Rashid Ali's pro-Axis revolt and in its incapacity to subdue Kurdish rebellions without British assistance. It was Lawrence of Arabia who said of the Arabs' fighting prowess in Seven Pillars of Wisdom: "One company of Turks firmly entrenched in open country could have defied the entire army of them."

So it would be today. Testifying before the Anglo-American Committee, General D'Arcy, then Commander-in-Chief in Palestine, declared that the Hagana could hold the country against all the Arab states for years. One reservation is necessary. Britain is at present helping to train and equip most of the Arab armies. Were such assistance allowed to continue after the Arabs went to war, the Hagana would be placed at a hopeless disadvantage.

Misery for the poor

A Palestine settlement will in the long run compel the Arab rulers to devote more attention to the plight of the barefoot Arab. Poverty and disease make the life of the Arab peasant or worker a condition little removed from walking death. A random sampling of social statistics tells an appalling story. In Egypt and other parts of the Middle East, nearly 90 per cent of the peasantry are wasting away from bilharzia. Malaria kills 50,000 annually in Iraq. The incidence of pellagra and trachoma is staggeringly high. Limbs are everywhere disfigured by what a perverted nationalism variously terms the Nile boil, the Bagdad boil, and the Aleppo Button.

Life expectancy in Iraq is 27 years; one child in two dies before the age of five. In Egypt, the most advanced of the Arab states, the death rate is higher than in India; in rural areas there is but one doctor to every 10,000 inhabitants. In the whole of Trans-Jordan, three times the size of Palestine, there are twenty-four physicians and five dentists. Everywhere dirt, ignorance, and official apathy and corruption invite epidemic disease; Egypt's cholera epidemic, now in its fourth month, is still spreading. During a previous anti-plague campaign it cost the Egyptian government $50 to kill a rat.

The Atlantic Report on the Middle East

One half of one per cent of the population owns one third of the land. Under an antiquated system of land tenure, the Arab peasantry is chronically in debt to usurers and absentee landlords; interest rates frequently range from 50 to 200 per cent. The average annual income of an Iraqui peasant family before the war was $35. Children six years old are employed in the cotton-gin plant of the Banque Misr of Egypt for a daily wage of fifteen cents. The Syrian agricultural worker is paid even less. Iraq, once the seat of a flowering civilization, now cultivates only 20 per cent of its arable land; Syria only 35 per cent. Slavery is recognized by law in Saudi Arabia and the Yemen, which was recently admitted to the UN.

Nothing remotely resembling democratic political conditions obtains in any of the Arab countries. Arab politics is an affair of personalities and family loyalties. When a former Egyptian premier was accused of packing the administration with his near relatives, he replied: "How can I run a government unless I have men I can trust in the key positions?"

Censorship powers enable the Arab governments to suspend or suppress by ministerial fiat newspapers critical of the administration. The Syrian Ministry of the Interior may dissolve any political party, group, or club that appears to act contrary to "the basic principles of the republican constitution."

Subsidies for the rich

In the past decade, hundreds of millions of dollars have poured into the Arab world — in the form of British subsidies, interest-free loans, oil royalties and expenditures by the oil companies, and wartime payments for goods and services purchased at highly inflated prices. Most of this wealth has been dissipated in regal display and the enrichment of the moneyed classes. Some of it now goes to support the Arab League, which can afford to vote the Mufti an allowance of $400,000.

These resources, if devoted to education, irrigation projects, and social services, could have transformed the face of the Arab world. The agricultural research section of the American Near East Foundation — a fine example of disinterested endeavor among the Arabs — offers impressive evidence of how much can be accomplished with how little: an expenditure of $600 on experiments to combat tomato disease in the Lebanon saved a crop worth two millions.

One of the great barriers to progress in the Arab world has been the relative absence of a socially conscious middle class. In the Lebanon, where French and American educators have long been active, 70 per cent of the population are literate, but elsewhere illiteracy ranges from 70 per cent in Syria to 90 per cent in Iraq, and more than that in the Arabian quadrilateral. There is no university in Iraq and only one newspaper in the Yemen, a country the size of Kansas with 3½ million people.

Rising clamor for reform

Thus between the ruling Arab oligarchy and the inarticulate masses there exists only a thin layer of struggling professional men, underpaid white-collar workers (most of them in the bureaucracy), and excitable students. Many of the members of this group, proud of being effendis (gentlemen) and conscious of their dependence on patronage for advancement, have in the past identified their interests with those of the pashas, and so have failed to constitute a progressive force in politics. Since the war, however, there has been a growing change in the outlook of the Arab middle-class intelligentsia — the most significant development in the Arab world since the time of Lawrence.

The young effendis in Cairo, Damascus, Beirut, and Bagdad are beginning to translate volatile clamor for reform into insistent pressure. Despite the repressive policies now in force under the guise of combating Communism, leftist journals and reform movements are sprouting faster than they can be suppressed.

The unanimity and vigor with which rival opposition parties protested the Lebanese and Iraqui elections are symptoms of a new temper among articulate Arabs. They cannot be swindled much longer with artificial excuses for postponing improvement of social conditions and obstructing the march of civilization. The proposed Jewish state will have the effect of quickening the civilizing process. In the course of time, it is bound to stimulate progressive Arabs with the example of an advanced technology, democratic institutions, and a sense of the dignity of human life unknown to the Arab oligarchy.

The Arab's greatest champion, T. E. Lawrence, once wrote: "I am decidedly in favor of Zionism. Indeed, I look on the Jews as the natural importers of that Western leaven which is so necessary for the countries of the Near East. . . . The success of their scheme will involve inevitably the raising of the present Arab population to their own material level, only a little after themselves in point of time, and the consequences might be of the highest importance for the future of the Arab world."

EXTEND RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

MESSAGE

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

TRANSMITTING

RECOMMENDATION THAT THE CONGRESS EXTEND THE RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT IN ITS PRESENT FORM FOR THREE YEARS, UNTIL JUNE 12, 1951

MARCH 1, 1948.—Referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed

To the Congress of the United States:

I recommend that the Congress extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in its present form for 3 years, until June 12, 1951. This act authorizes the President, under well-defined procedures and limitations, to conclude agreements with other countries for the reciprocal reduction of tariffs and other obstacles to international trade.

For 14 years the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has been an essential element of United States foreign policy. It was first enacted in 1934 and has been extended by the Congress four times, on each occasion after thorough study of its operation and results. It is well known to the American people and has drawn their constant and increasing support, regardless of party affiliation.

The basic reason for this constant popular support and repeated congressional approval is that the act has provided a sound method for increasing world trade through progressive lowering of trade barriers, to the benefit of living standards both here and abroad.

The importance of the act is greater today than it has ever been. Together with other nations, we are engaged in a mighty endeavor to build a prosperous and peaceful world. The financial assistance we have already contributed, and the further aid we shall give to nations in Europe and elsewhere, constitute a tremendous investment toward world economic recovery. The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, by stimulating an increasing flow of trade between nations, will contribute strongly to the achievement of this objective. Its extension is essential if we are to complete the work we have begun.

The trade-agreements program contributes not only to the restoration of a prosperous world economy; it also contributes directly to the welfare and prosperity of the people of the United States. Our people need to import many commodities from abroad; we need equally to export many of our products. Both needs are served by agreements which reduce or eliminate obstacles to commerce between the United States and other countries.

These agreements recognize the fundamental fact that trade is a two-way business and that our foreign commerce depends upon a balanced relationship between imports and exports. Foreign countries must be able to sell to us if they are to have the dollars to pay for our exports and to repay our loans. Adequate markets for our agricultural and industrial producers depend upon the lowering of trade barriers by other countries. Imports of goods needed in this country improve the standard of living of our people as consumers at the same time that they make possible the maintenance of markets for our people as producers.

Currently, we are exporting far more than we are importing. But this is a temporary condition made necessary by considerations of overriding importance. The trade-agreements program is a sound method for achieving a more balanced relationship in the future within the broader framework of the expanding world trade so necessary to economic reconstruction.

In addition, by contributing to the lowering of trade barriers the United States can support the expansion of private trading as distinct from Government trading. The existence of trade restrictions is too often accompanied by Government participation in trading operations—extending even to trading by Government agencies. The preservation of our private enterprise system at home is closely bound up with the reduction of trade restrictions and the encouragement of private international trade.

The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is a proven instrument for achieving these objectives. Prior to 1945 the United States had concluded agreements with 29 countries, affecting about one-half of our foreign commerce. These agreements helped greatly to reduce trade barriers and to stimulate the foreign commerce of the United States and the other countries concerned.

Since 1945 we have continued our efforts to reduce the strains imposed upon the world economy by narrow concepts of economic nationalism. Last summer at Geneva the United States and 22 other countries concluded the most important and comprehensive trade agreement in history. By this agreement these 23 nations agreed to reduce their tariffs, or to maintain low tariffs or none at all, on a wide variety of products. The products affected accounted in 1938 for over half the world's international trade. In addition, the Geneva agreement included commitments to curb the use of other trade restrictions, such as import quotas and preferential treatment of imports from one country as against those from another.

This agreement is a landmark in international economic relations. Never before have so many nations combined in such an intensive effort to reduce barriers to trade. While it will be some time before the benefits of the agreement can be fully felt, it is clear that it will make a substantial contribution to the expansion of world trade and to the recovery of the world economy.

We expect that many other countries will wish to join the Geneva agreement. The continuance of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is necessary to enable the United States to play its part in extending this reduction of trade barriers to these other countries. Furthermore, we shall need the authority of the act to make appropriate revisions in the Geneva agreement as they are made necessary by changing world conditions.

The trade-agreements authority will also be needed to enable us, in concert with other nations, to carry out the International Trade Organization charter, now being completed at Habana. The United States has actively sponsored the creation of this Organization to encourage the conduct of trade between nations on fair and liberal principles and to provide a forum where nations can consult on points of economic difference and on cooperative measures to solve common economic problems. The proposed charter, which will be presented to the Congress at a later date, includes as one of its cardinal points the undertaking that all member countries will stand ready to negotiate for the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis. The extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act will enable us to carry out this undertaking.

For all these reasons I am convinced that we should continue the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. The positive benefits to world trade, to United States export industries and agriculture, and to our domestic consumers are beyond question. Furthermore, we need have no fear of serious harm to any domestic producer. An expanding foreign trade promotes the most efficient use of our productive resources and contributes to the growing prosperity of the whole Nation.

In addition, the interests of domestic producers are carefully protected in the negotiation of each trade agreement. I assured the Congress, when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was last extended in 1945, that domestic producers would be safeguarded in the process of expanding trade. That commitment has been kept. It will continue to be kept. The practice will be continued of holding extensive public hearings to obtain the view of all interested persons before negotiations are even begun. The practice will be continued whereby each agreement before its conclusion will be carefully studied by the Departments of State, Treasury, Agriculture, Commerce and Labor, the National Military Establishment, and the United States Tariff Commission. Finally, each agreement will continue to include a clause which will permit withdrawal or modification of concessions if, as a result of unforeseen developments and of the concessions, imports increase to such an extent as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers.

The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is a tested and practical means, which has wide bipartisan support, for achieving the benefits of expanding world commerce for the United States and for other countries. It is a continuing evidence of the determination of the United States to contribute its full share to the reconstruction of a sound and growing world economy as the basis for enduring peace. As such, I strongly recommend that the act be extended for an additional 3 years.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 80th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

The Battle for World Peace and Stability

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 1, 1948

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, for the sake of continuity I respectfully ask my colleagues to permit me to conclude my general statement on the pending bill without interruption.

Mr. President, with the unanimous approval of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I report the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 in its perfected text. In the name of peace, stability, and freedom it deserves prompt passage. In the name of intelligent American self-interest it envisions a mighty undertaking worthy of our faith. It is an economic act—but economics usually control national survivals these days. The act itself asserts that "disruption following in the wake of war is not contained by national frontiers." It asserts that "the existing situation in Europe endangers the establishment of a lasting peace, the general welfare and national interest of the United States, and the attainment of the objectives of the United Nations."

Every Senator knows that these dangers are even greater than they were when those words were written only two short weeks ago. The fate of Czechoslovakia, where any semblance of democracy has just been gutted by subversive conquest, underscores this solemn thesis. The kindred fate of brave little Finland may be adding to the ominous score this very afternoon even while we debate an axiom, namely, that aggressive communism threatens all freedom and all security, whether in the Old World or in the New, when it puts free peoples anywhere in chains.

The act asserts sound doctrine when it says that it is "the policy of the people of the United States to sustain and strengthen principles of individual liberty, free institutions and genuine independence through assistance to those countries of Europe which participate in a joint recovery program based upon self-help and mutual cooperation." Mr. President, this act may well become a welcome beacon in the world's dark night, but if a beacon is to be lighted at all it had better be lighted before it is too late.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, the decision which here concerns the Senate is the kind that tries men's souls. I understand and share the anxieties involved. It would be a far happier circumstance if we could close our eyes to reality, comfortably retire within our bastions, and dream of an isolated and prosperous peace. But that which was once our luxury would now become our folly. This is too plain to be persuasively denied in a foreshortened, atomic world. We must take things as they are.

The greatest nation on earth either justifies or surrenders its leadership. We must choose. There are no blueprints to guarantee results. We are entirely surrounded by calculated risks. I profoundly believe that the pending program is the best of these risks. I have no quarrel with those who disagree, because we are dealing with imponderables. But I am bound to say to those who disagree that they have not escaped to safety by rejecting or subverting this plan. They have simply fled to other risks, and I fear far greater ones. For myself, I can only say that I prefer my choice of responsibilities.

This legislation, Mr. President, seeks peace and stability for freemen in a free world. It seeks them by economic rather than by military means. It proposes to help our friends to help themselves in the pursuit of sound and successful liberty in the democratic pattern. The quest can mean as much to us as it does to them. It aims to preserve the victory against aggression and dictatorship which we thought we won in World War II. It strives to help stop World War III before it starts. It fights the economic chaos which would precipitate far-flung disintegration. It sustains western civilization. It means to take western Europe completely off the American dole at the end of the adventure. It recognizes the grim truth—whether we like it or not—that American self-interest, national economy, and national security are inseverably linked with these objectives. It stops if changed conditions are no longer consistent with the national interest of the United States. It faces the naked facts of life.

Within the purview of this plan are 270,000,000 people of the stock which has largely made America. These are 26 percent of all the literates of the earth. Before the war they operated 68 percent of all the ships that sailed the sea. They grew 27 percent of all the world's cereals. They produced 37 percent of the world's steel. They sold 24 percent of the world's exports and bought 39 percent of the world's imports. They are struggling, against great and ominous odds, to regain their feet. They must not be allowed to fail. The world—America emphatically included—needs them as both producers and consumers. Peace needs their healthy restoration to the continuing defense of those ideals by which free men live. This vast friendly segment of the earth must not collapse. The iron curtain must not come to the rims of the Atlantic either by aggression or by default.

I wish, Mr. President, swiftly to sketch the chain reaction of events responsible for the issue we here confront. It is a significant narrative which speaks for itself in behalf of the need and justification for this heroic adventure, the greatest ever initiated by any one nation for the sake of peaceful humanities. In the background, of course, is the war itself; the military defeat of the Axis; the utter prostration of postwar Europe amid the ashes of its victory; the resultant tragedy of far-flung human want and suffering; the paralysis of the peace that has not yet come; the rise of new aggression reaching out for ominous conquest amid distraught and disintegrating peoples. I do not here assess whatever mistakes in statesmanship may have helped precipitate or prolong these catastrophies. It is enough, for the present consideration, that the tragedies occurred and that they still threaten the peace, stability, and security of this whole earth, the United States again emphatically included.

In the sanctuary of our relative good fortune where not one bomb fell during all those desperate days when the skies of Europe were raining death, we promptly and willingly went to the postwar aid of our prostrate friends. We literally leaped with them from one crisis to another. Bill after bill went through Congress for their relief, and billion after billion went from us to them. Two years of this went by. Often the efforts failed of the desired results—although, despite all debits, I hesitate to think what would have happened in the absence of the efforts. But it became clear that the process could not indefinitely go on, first, because western Europe could not wait longer for real emancipation; second, because America could not longer afford to underwrite futility. We were both near the ends of our ropes.

Then came June 5, 1947. Secretary of State Marshall made a speech at Harvard. Just as at neighboring Concord in an earlier century, it proved to be "a shot heard round the world." At the moment it was just a few sentences in a quiet sequence. I quote:

It is already evident that before the United States Government can proceed much further in its effort to alleviate the situation and help the European world on its way to recovery, there must be some agreement among the countries of Europe as to the requirements of the situation and the part those countries themselves will take in order to give proper effect to whatever action might be undertaken by this Government. The initiative, I think, must come from Europe.

The role of this country should consist of friendly aid in the drafting of a European program and of later support of such a program so far as it may be practical for us to do so. The program should be a joint one, agreed to by a number, if not all, of the European nations.

Mr. President, the responsive effect in Europe was electric. History wrote with rushing pen. It was a new call to the colors—this time a peace call to mobilize for self-help and cooperation in quest of mutual survival. The British Bevin and the French Bidault promptly summoned a European conference. They consulted the Russian Molotov. He met with them in Paris on June 27. As usual, his demands were impossible; and, as usual, treacherous Moscow propaganda charged us with iniquitous American "imperialism," a charge shockingly echoed by some of our own citizens. The Soviets vetoed concerted action, but Bevin and Bidault went ahead. They invited 22 European nations—all of them—to meet in Paris. All Soviet-dominated countries sent their refusals, including Czechoslovakia, which, after a hasty summons to the Kremlin, withdrew its previous approval and now finds itself forcefully communized against any further expressions of self-will. Sixteen nations accepted the invitation. Here they are: Austria, Greece, Norway, Switzerland, Belgium, Iceland, Portugal, Turkey, Denmark, Ireland, Sweden, United Kingdom, France, Italy, Luxemburg, Netherlands.

They met on July 12 and organized the Committee of European Economic Cooperation, known as CEEC. They met to coordinate the independent nations of Europe in a self-help effort to seek stability and preserve freedom in response to the dynamic impulse of what was then called the Marshall plan. They met to plan hopeful cooperation that might justify American assistance. And they met bravely, Mr. President—"bravely" because it was in virtual defiance of the Russian Bear, which promptly showed its teeth.

Within 4 weeks Moscow dictated new reprisal agreements and tighter affiliations with all her satellites, and quickly organized the Cominform, through which the Communists of nine nations speak for the Communist world. The "iron curtain" took on more "iron." The Cominform is a modern version of the supposedly defunct Comintern, which was communism's prior agent of world violence and revolution. It frankly calls upon Communists everywhere to wreck the Marshall plan and condemns it and us with a new intemperance of invective and distortion. It is indeed "cold war." It is pressure war against the independent recovery of western Europe. Obviously, it is also aimed at us. It is a conspiracy to prevent the emergence of order out of chaos, stability out of confusion, and western freedom out of hopelessness. Communists everywhere have responded. The great sabotage is under way. Let me make it completely plain that I do not suggest, even by the remotest inference, that all opponents to the plan are Communists. I have already expressed my complete respect for the honest opinions of citizens who disagree. I simply point out, as part of the record, that while every critic is not a Communist, every Communist is a critic, and the orders from the Kremlin are to wreck this enterprise. Thus, the postwar pattern continues in familiar and consistent form.

I said that the 16 cooperating nations in CEEC acted bravely, as I hope we, too, may do. I have in mind not only the implications of the Cominform, but also such threatening statements as that by Mr. Molotov saying:

The Soviet Government considers it necessary to caution the Governments of Great Britain and France against the consequences of such action.

Yet, Mr. President, there is nothing in this plan which threatens the Soviet police empire with any sort of consequence which she does not herself choose voluntarily to invite. It is not a plan against eastern Europe, unless the independent survival of free peoples is on the blacklist. It is a plan for western Europe. It is not external conquest. It is not dictation. It is internal recuperation by self-chosen methods. Eastern Europe was invited in. It was her own decision that keeps her out. It seems obvious that at least three of these countries behind the curtain would have joined if left to their own free wills. But, Mr. President, there are no free wills in police states.

East-west flow of trade in Europe is necessary to both. Its resumption will be profitable to both. There is nothing in this plan which retards this resumption, unless Moscow itself so elects. The healthy recuperation of western Europe should facilitate this resumption for the good of all concerned, if we can have a peaceful world. All poisoned propaganda to the contrary notwithstanding, both at home and abroad, this is America's incentive and her dearest wish.

The honorable release of east-west tension would be the greatest boon of modern times. It can be released whenever there is mutual east-west fidelity to the objectives of World War II asserted by the united Allies on January 1, 1942, and whenever there is mutual east-west fidelity to the principles and purposes of the United Nations. It can be released whenever there is mutual east-west respect for the rights of free peoples to order their own lives. There is no consistent effort which the Government of the United States should withhold in pursuit of this objective. We must always be ready for any discussion to this end. Peace with justice is our utterly paramount concern. Any thought of another war is abhorrent to our souls. But peace and appeasement are not on speaking terms, and they have not been since Munich, after World War I, and Yalta, in World War II.

But let me resume the narrative. The CEEC met for 10 weeks in Paris, concluding on September 22. It has been cynically said that they met just to total up a bill to present to Uncle Sam. Nothing could be more cruel or further from the truth. They met to see what they could do to meet the Marshall self-help specifications, and they concluded mutual pledges of amazing portent and vitality. We did not dictate their ticket. They wrote it for themselves. They volunteered their pledges—to use all efforts to develop production up to agreed targets—to apply all necessary measures leading to the rapid achievement of internal financial monetary and economic stability—to cooperate in all possible steps to reduce barriers to the expansion of trade—to set up a joint organization to follow these objectives through and to insure them to the fullest possible extent. All these, and many other obligations, they offered to assume. It was a historic moment. Someday the United States of Europe may look back upon it as we do to the Annapolis Conference which preceded the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia. It was a courageous and constructive answer to the United States. It offered the best chance for stable peace and for peaceful stability that there is on earth today—outside of a reinvigorated United Nations which it would immensely further. For myself, Mr. President, I assert the deep conviction that it is worth the wholehearted cooperation of the United States as the cheapest and most promising peace investment in our own self-interest that we face. What we can "afford to do" is one thing—and never to be minimized. But what we cannot afford not to do is just as vital in the estimates of prudent statesmanship.

I comment, in passing, that these were not idle words at Paris. Our friends meant exactly what they said. They have already begun to prove it. "Benelux" already joints three of these countries in a customs union. Others are ready to come in. France has already performed major surgery on her currency. Italy and France have faced powerful Communist subversion and survived the test—a feat that might well have been impossible without our present and prospective economic aid. They, too, are negotiating a customs union. Bizonia in Germany is now well likely to become Trizonia in the spirit of new unity at the heart and core of European recovery. Britain's Bevin, backed by the united spokesmanship of his country, is calling for western union. These are new signs of the new times, Mr. President. If these trends are thwarted, if these hopes are dashed, I confess that I tremble for the consequences in this foreshortened world. This is not hysteria. It is simple candor. In my view, the approaching Senate roll calls are that important—to them and to us.

Now, Mr. President, make note of this: All these CEEC promises and pledges—importantly, including, by the way, the acquisition of essential strategic materials for stock piling in the United States—are to be written into agreements as a condition precedent to our cooperation. There will be specific bilateral contracts between the United States and each beneficiary country. There will be specific targets. There will be multilateral contracts in which all countries underwrite the common aim and the common cause. The obligations will be set down in black and white. This is no mere wishing well. For one example, in respect to the most vital commodity of all, coal production is pledged to go from 398,000,000 tons in 1946 to 495,000,000 tons in 1949 and 586,000,000 tons in 1952.

Your Committee on Foreign Relations has made every possible effort to protect all these expectations. Indeed, this legislation which the Senate is asked to approve categorically asserts that—

> The continuity of assistance provided by the United States should at all times be dependent upon the continuity of cooperation among the countries involved.

The act categorically asserts that—> the Administrator shall terminate assistance under this act to any participating country whenever he determines that such country is not adhering to its agreement or is diverting from the purposes of this act assistance provided thereunder.

No law can guarantee its own success. No man has a right dogmatically to say that any plan will succeed in these dangerous days of flux. But here is a warrant for maximum confidence that we do not indefinitely undertake a failure. All the more it makes the chance worth taking.

Now let me return to the narrative again. The CEEC summoned its best minds abroad to the council table. They had been warned by the Harvard speech that America expected a self-contained plan which could reasonably progress toward the restoration of economic independence and the end of American assistance. They had been warned that a successful recovery program must take the place of everlasting relief programs. They set to work to meet the challenge. At the end of 10 weeks they produced the answer. It would take 4¼ years of intensive self-help and cooperation, with progressively decreasing American assistance during this term of years. Their original estimate was that it might require an over-all total of twenty-two and four-tenths billions of American aid for western Europe, including western Germany. Chiefly by the deduction of capital-equipment items, this figure came down to seventeen billions for 4¼ years. In other words, this peace investment might cost one-third as much in 4¼ years as we appropriated for war in just one bill that passed the Senate in 5 minutes and without a roll call one June afternoon in 1944. War has no bargains. I think peace has. I believe I am talking about one now.

I digress, however, to say that there is no seventeen billions or any other comparable figure in this pending legislation. It was in the first executive draft that came to us 2 months ago. I immediately asked for its deletion, and the State Department promptly acquiesced, because it could be no more than an educated guess of doubtful validity if we thus were to attempt to assess events and values so far in advance. Furthermore, it might be misconstrued abroad as a specific dollar commitment without their understanding that one American Congress cannot commit another. Yet the genius of the program, if we are to escape year-to-year relief, is sufficient continuity to encourage dependable long-range planning. We rightly demand continuity of performance from our friends as the price of continuity of aid. It is elementary and indispensable fair play, on the other hand, that continuity of aid similarly should follow continuity of satisfactory performance. It must be inherent and implicit in our purpose. Otherwise, I repeat, this is merely one more stopgap, "rat-hole" operation.

Your Committee on Foreign Relations has met this situation, Mr. President, by familiar statutory device. As is our standard practice when dealing with public projects overlapping into subsequent fiscal years, we have authorized to be appropriated from time to time for 4½ years such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act. But the only specific dollar authorization in the act is for 1 year, commencing next April. I shall discuss that later. Suffice it for the moment to point out that this has the effect of eliminating the necessity for subsequent annual authorizations. It thus simplifies the subsequent procedure. But it leaves each annual appropriation, as indeed it must, to the annual decision of the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate and to the annual discretion of the Congress. The net of it is that the recovery program will pass in annual review. It will be tested annually for its promised accomplishments and for the continuity of its performance. It will be tested annually for its impact on our own economy. Each Congress is free to decide these subsequent issues for itself. But they will do so in the presence of the declared attitude and opinion of the Eightieth Congress, as expressed in this act, that the program, if successful, should carry through to whatever conclusion it proves to deserve. To withhold an expression of this purpose would be to repudiate our own thesis and to pitifully reduce this act to the status of just one more sterile dole. It would be to rob the act of all the cumulative values upon which we depend for net results and which can infinitely bless us all.

Now, Mr. President, let the narrative deal with equally significant events on this side of the ocean here at home. As soon as it became evident that CEEC intended to act upon Secretary Marshall's suggestion, the President began complementary studies at this end of the line. In my responsibility as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, I asked for his immediate appointment of an independent civilian group of seasoned and widely experienced citizens to survey the field and to report what America might wisely and safely do—I repeat those controlling words, "wisely" and "safely"—in connection with the contemplated program. As a result, such a group was named by the President on June 22, 1947, under the chairmanship of Secretary of Commerce Harriman, who was the only Government official on the panel. Its bipartisan membership was completely independent of the Government and its judgments were likewise. It had as fine and as representative a personnel as was ever gathered together to do an unselfish, patriotic job; and it labored with spectacular and unremitting zeal upon its complex task. Its ultimate report is one of the most comprehensive ever made in respect to a public problem. These credentials are important because, as a result, I think it is of paramount importance to us that this Harriman committee, despite occasional disagreement respecting details, came to the over-all conclusion that this recovery program not only is well within our American capacity but also that it is essential to the best welfare of the United States. This, remember, was the verdict of representative American citizenship. I do not know how any great problem in public policy could have been submitted to more competent audit. I commend this thought to prejudicial critics who do not and could not have comparable access to all the facts.

I quote one sentence from the Harriman committee's findings:

> The committee is convinced that a sound program for western European recovery should be formulated and adopted by the United States with the same boldness and determination, and the same confidence in the worthiness of the democratic cause, which characterized our action in World War II.

That is the target of private citizenship mobilized through the high spokesmanship of the Harriman committee.

I quote one other sentence:

> The domestic consequences (of the fall of western Europe to Communist dominion) are such as no American could easily tolerate.

Does that require any application? I think not. But it is a timely reminder that the Senate cannot contemplate its decision on this pending act with complete and comfortable detachment, as if there may be no price for us to pay if we reject or emasculate this plan. We have no such complacent option. There is an alternative price. I simply suggest, in passing, for example, that Secretary of Defense Forrestal and Army Secretary Royall testified to our committee that in the absence of some reasonable prospect for the stabilization of western Europe they would find it necessary to urgently demand billions more for national military defense. That, however, is only a small part of what could be the alternative price in a Communist-dominated world. The Harriman committee says the total consequences could include, and I again quote the committee, the spokesmanship for the civilian population of this Nation, "the immediate and sweeping limitation of our economic and political life, perhaps extending even to our form of government."

Which might be the alternative.

But let me again take up the narrative. In addition to the Harriman report, we have the survey by Secretary of the Interior Krug on Natural Resources and Foreign Aid. I quote one sentence:

> The aggregate productive capacity of the United States appears ample.

In the same vein we had the so-called Nourse report, from the President's economic advisers. We also had the exhaustive studies of the executive departments through a large committee headed by able Under Secretary Lovett.

Now, Mr. President, I want to make it plain that all of this exploration dealt preponderantly with the most critical of all considerations, namely, the impact of this plan upon our own domestic economy. Nothing could be of more importance because we all agree that the maintenance of a sound and solvent United States is as indispensable to the hopes of the world as it is to us It would be final blunder to jeopardize our stabilities at home. We shall not do so. I am glad to echo the warning of the Harriman report that "it is not wise to underestimate the steepness of the climb," and that "the aid which the United States gives will impose definite sacrifice on the United States." That is obvious. This is no happy picnic. Heavy post-war peace expenditures involve a burden, just as did the infinitely heavier expenditures of the war-that-was, or the expenditures of another war which we propose, with every resource at our command, to prevent. Any drain upon our commodities not in surplus also is a burden, although it is significant to note that the contemplated exports under this plan at its very peak are substantially less than our average exports for 1947. But all authorities agree that the plan can be managed to avoid serious interference with our domestic economy. They agree that it would not precipitate domestic controls which would not be required by the domestic situation alone. For example, there will be no competitive exports of meat under this plan for at least 2 years. There will be no exports of metal scrap. Petroleum products, by the explicit terms of the bill itself, must be purchased offshore to the maximum practicable extent.

Sound administration of the act, Mr. President, will hold all these impacts to a minimum. The bill itself is explicit in these directives. In general terms it lays down the fundamental rule that "no assistance to the participating countries shall seriously impair the economic stability of the United States." In specific terms it lays down the injunction that—

> The Administrator must provide for procurement in such a way as to (1) minimize the drain upon the resources of the United States and the impact of such procurement upon the domestic economy, and (2) avoid impairing the vital need of the people of the United States.

The proponents of this measure, in a word, are not riding rainbows. They recognize the calculated risk. They think it is worth taking in our own enlightened self-interest. They prefer it to the alternative risk. But they proceed with prudence. They recognize the priority which self-interest assigns to the protection of our own domestic situation. We are not to be committed beyond this legitimate boundary. But they believe that we can do both jobs—at home and abroad—and that we cannot afford not to take the preferable chance. In a word, they believe in America.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the act itself, which is unanimously endorsed by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee after 5 weeks of public hearings and 10 days of continuous executive sessions. I cannot speak too gratefully of the friendly patience and bipartisan unity with which my committee colleagues cooperated. If something of their spirit imbues those for whom this legislation is intended, the Economic Cooperation Administration, as it will be called, has hopeful augury.

We confronted many serious perplexities involving wide divergence of opinion in and out of Congress. Perhaps the greatest of these was the question how this gigantic trust should be administered. It is the universal opinion that the success of the enterprise is largely dependent upon the character of its management. It is the universal opinion that its overriding economic purpose requires the highest available type of seasoned business experience and the widest possible autonomous authority for those who patriotically assume these vast economic responsibilities. It is equally the universal opinion that the highest considerations of foreign policy are constantly involved and that, as I said upon a previous historic occasion, we cannot have two Secretaries of State at the same time.

To fit these conflicting specifications into common pattern was, indeed, a jigsaw puzzle. We invited the Brookings Institution of Washington, one of the most respected research laboratories in the country, to make an objective study of this enigma. I express our great obligation to the Brookings Institution for the masterly job it did. The provisions in the pending bill largely follow its recommendations. I am happy to say the result already enjoys well-nigh universal approval in and out of Congress.

We are creating the Economic Cooperation Administration. At its head will be an Administrator with Cabinet status. In him, under final Presidential control, is vested the responsibility for operating this enterprise. The Administrator and the Secretary of State will keep each other fully and currently informed. Whenever the Secretary of State believes that any action of the Administrator is inconsistent with the foreign policy objectives of the United States, he will consult with the Administrator and, if differences of view are not adjusted, the matter will be referred to the President for final decision. This is a paraphrase of the formula which has worked so well in the Atomic Energy Act involving somewhat similarly mixed functions.

Behind the Administrator, and his Deputy, will be the Public Advisory Board, headed by the Administrator, organized on a bipartisan basis, and consisting of not more than 12 members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, "selected from among citizens of broad and varied experience in matters affecting the public interest." Its functions are advisory. But its utility is profound.

Overseas a special economic mission will be established by the Administrator and under his direction in each participating country; and the chief of each such mission will cooperate with our Ambassador or Minister under a general rule of conduct reflecting the contacts set up for the Administrator and the Secretary of State to avoid inconsistent decisions by either. Meanwhile what might be called a roving ambassador will represent us in dealing with any European organization of participating countries as insistently envisioned by the act. The creation of this post underscores our firm conviction that the salvation of western Europe lies in consolidated self-help and cooperation. Dollars alone will not save them. American assistance alone will not save them. All through the bill we bluntly assert these axioms. What they do for themselves will save them. What they do for themselves is the only possible vindication of our aid. But without a roving ambassador there would be no way for us to hold these governments to strict accountability for these relationships upon which they and we must depend for the final basic success of the undertaking.

To keep the House and Senate, here at home, in intimate touch with the evolution of all these plans, the bill creates the Joint Congressional Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation—again borrowing this device of proved utility from the Atomic Energy Act. It will consist of seven Senators and seven Representatives. It will be bipartisan. It is already familiarly known as the watchdog committee. Little added definition is required. It will make continuous studies of what goes on. It will provide continuous and intimate congressional liaison with all these undertakings. In general sense it will represent the taxpayers of the United States. It will greatly simplify the subsequent annual responsibilities of Congress when, once each year during the life of this arrangement, it must determine in what degree yesterday's performance warrants tomorrow's continuing cooperation.

I omit further needless details. This is the picture and the pattern of administration. It gives every promise that previous errors in foreign aid will be avoided. It fixes and implements clear and specific responsibilities. It umpires in advance functional conflicts between business management on the one hand and foreign policy upon the other. It is our best possible promise of efficient and effective results in restabilizing a broken world.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the specific figure asked by the President for the first authorization under this bill. It was $6,800,000,000 for 15 months from next April first. This was the result of rigorous screening by the executive authorities of the CEEC proposals for $8,400,000,000 and a realistic appraisal of domestic availabilities. It took full account of the Harriman, Krug, and Nourse reports. It was the composite judgment of diversified minds. Secretary Marshall said it was as near a precision figure as human judgments can foresee. Certainly it was sustained by the most complete studies and surveys I have ever seen in a congressional committee. It was further sustained by the independent investigation of the Harriman committee—composed, remember, of the best business brains available in our civilian life. The comparable Harriman figure was approximately the same. It was still further sustained by the head of the International Bank, who also examined the problem independently and concluded that the figure is a tight-fitting minimum. It was in no sense a stab in the dark. At the very least it is entitled to a presumption of relative dependability until more competent authority competently proves otherwise.

But I can fully understand, Mr. President, why this figure immediately became the subject of wide controversy. In the first place, there was a big gap between this figure and the President's budgetary estimate of actual cash disbursements for this purpose in the next fiscal year—a gap representing obligations and commitments which must be made in advance if our plans are to possess efficient continuity. In the second place, we have been overwhelmed with such a wealth and welter of supporting statistics that even our own experts—to say nothing of our committee members—have rivaled each other in their headaches. At such a moment it is dangerously easy to "lose sight of the forest for the trees." Busy pencils, playing with their decimals, can make objectivity impossible. The committee's unanimous recommendation escapes the horns of this dilemma by rooting itself in a few solid fundamentals which I commend to the common sense of my colleagues.

First. If this plan can succeed on the basis recommended by its authors, no well-wisher would allow it to fail at its inception through lack of original resources sufficient to its success. That would be "penny wisdom and pound foolishness." It could even be unwitting sabotage.

Second. Any estimate of these essential resources, in advance of experience with the plan, is problematical at best. In such circumstance we should start with figures which enjoy the preponderance of supporting evidence rather than to arbitrarily slice off what might be the difference between success and still-born failure.

Third. Therefore prudence recommends that we launch the plan with figures which offer no alibi for failure; but on a timetable which permits us to review the figures at the earliest moment when experience will permit us to deal with the realities.

On the basis of these sanities, the Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously cut the duration of this first authorization from 15 months to 12 and it reduced the figure from $6,800,000,000 to $5,300,000,000. This latter figure accurately reflects the estimated expenditures and commitments for the first 12 months of the original work sheet for 15 months. In other words, we have not undermined the resources for 1 year from April 1, 1948, which we are warned by the authors of this plan are essential to its success. We have not transferred from them to us the responsibility for a failure which might be charged to initial lack of funds. We have not impaired either the resources or the psychology upon which the plan depends. But we have made it imperative that the first task of the next Congress and the next administration next January shall be to resurvey this whole problem in the light of experience and reality; and thus we have reduced the first authorization by $1,500,000,000.

Mr. President, I attach the greatest importance to this change in the timetable. By next New Years we shall have had 9 months' experience with this enterprise. We shall then know the efficiency of its all-important administrative management; and we shall have the benefit of the Administrator's advice. We shall also have the first-hand judgments of our own joint congressional watch-dog committee. We shall know whether a good crop overseas has lightened the CEEC deficit. We shall know much more about the nature and extent—or perhaps even the suspension—of the sabotage campaigns of the wrecking crews. Most important of all, we shall know to what extent self-help and mutual cooperation in western Europe are giving promise of the vitality upon which this plan inseverably rests. We shall know many things upon which today we can only speculate.

It seems to me that we have everything to gain and nothing to lose—assuming that we are entering upon this high adventure in good faith—by launching this hopeful enterprise full-steam-ahead; and reserving our seasoned and informed judgments for next January, as contemplated by the committee's recommendation, when we shall know whereof we speak instead of gambling now with unknown destiny. I beg of Senators to take this concept to their hearts. This is more than a problem of mathematics; it is a problem in peace, stability, and human freedoms. It may not work. I think it will. But if it fails, let the responsibility rest elsewhere. I say again—as I have said so many times before—these recommended figures are not sacred. But in the light of the powerful credentials they possess, unless the Appropriations Committee can strongly prove them wrong, let us give them the benefit of any doubts for the time being. Next January is not long to wait for the accounting with so much at stake.

One thing more about this figure of $5,300,000,000. It goes for loans and grants. The division rests with the Administrator, counseled by his own board and by the National Advisory Council consisting of the highest officers of Government. The division will depend upon the beneficiary's ability to pay and upon the nature of the assistance. The loans will be serviced by the Export-Import Bank. It is roughly estimated that loans will represent from 20 percent to 40 percent of the grand total. Using the lower percentage in averaged application to the first year's authorization, its net cost to us is much nearer $4,000,000,000 than $5,300,000,000. It could be—we may hope it will be—even lower in its net effect.

At this point I interject another vital fact. While it is impossible to establish accurate categories at the moment, it is expected that 2 or 3 of these 16 countries in CEEC will be cooperators without any drain upon our dollar aid. They will pay their own way. It also is expected that three other countries will be exclusively on a temporary loan basis—without any grants. It is contemplated that only two countries will be exclusively on a basis of grants. The other eight countries will be on a variable scale of loans and grants. This is no loose give-away. In every instance the plan is geared to hardpan economics.

I now speak of the method used to arrive at this figure. It involves so-called balance of payments. For each country this is the difference between national income from exports, foreign services, and foreign investments, on the one hand, and essential imports of goods and services, on the other hand. This is the balance of payments, and when the former are insufficient to pay for the latter, and there is no gold or convertible currency to make up the difference, any such deficit country is in jeopardy. Under normal exchange conditions, surplus exchange with one country can be balanced against an exchange deficit with others. But this situation does not exist today, and will not until foreign currencies and international exchange are restabilized. This is one of the long-range objectives of this plan—important to every trading nation on earth, our own emphatically included. Meanwhile, the immediate and indispensable objective is to overcome these deficits in western Europe, including western Germany.

Current calculations accordingly were made by the following process: First, estimating each country's import requirements; second, deducting therefrom each country's exports and earnings from foreign services and foreign investments and from any other sources; third, deducting available imports from other Western Hemisphere areas. This final figure, translated into dollars, represents the amount of support from us to permit these 16 European countries, plus western Germany, to import from the Western Hemisphere the commodities essential to recovery. Import requirements of recipient countries were figured on a basis so close that they do not even restore full prewar living standards. In other words, the figures are down to bedrock.

Obviously, this brief description oversimplifies the process. There are many other factors influencing the net result. There are many imponderables, I say again and again. Only experience can demonstrate whether the realities will thrust upwards or push downwards the true evaluation. But this is generally accepted as the best measure of need. It was accepted by the Paris Conference, the executive departments, the Harriman committee, and the International Bank.

I do not undertake to demonstrate that the resultant 12-month figure of $5,300,000,000 in the bill is precisely accurate. I am content to point out that it is little short of amazing how close together all these estimates, independently made, proved to be. I am content to point out that the timetable in this act, as we have reported it, permits the earliest possible congressional review in the presence of reality. I am content to urge that the burden of proof falls heavily upon those who would argue that, pending this early review, the preliminary figure is too large. I have no sympathy with any "take this or nothing" attitude. But I do prayerfully believe that adequacy is the essence of what we do; and surely we can all agree that success with $5,300,000,000 in the first instance is preferable to failure with something less. I remind the Senate further that, under the bill's new timetable, we can balance out even the next fiscal year by the appropriations for the fourth quarter. If facts, as we will know them next January, require readjustments, we can make them in the final quarter. Then we can put them up or down with some degree of justified assurance. When we try to adjust them today, we play with danger to the lifeline of the plan.

Many other features of the pending bill will develop with the debate. At the moment I refer, finally, to only two.

First. Local currencies must be deposited by each beneficiary country to offset the value of any aid not furnished on terms of payment. The beneficiary country and the United States will agree on the local expenditure of these local currency accumulations in behalf of the purposes of this act. Thus our grants will not become a budgetary windfall in the beneficiary country but will virtually become a revolving fund to do double duty in behalf of the act's objectives.

Second. The investment of private American capital, in approved reconstruction projects in the 16 countries and western Germany, is encouraged by our guaranty of the subsequent convertibility of profits or original investment into dollars. This obviates the hazard most likely to prevent private investment. At the same time it is a highly practical invitation to American private initiative to join in this great adventure on a free-enterprise basis.

Now, Mr. President, with apologies to my colleagues for the length of this intrusion upon their good nature, I conclude. With a few desultory comments, I am done.

First. This act does not include some of our other unavoidable international obligations. We shall have to deal at this session with China, Greece, Turkey, and Trieste, and with the occupied areas for which we are responsible as a legacy from the war. These things must be remembered as we proceed. We must deal with over-all considerations. Particularly we must faithfully remember the superlative importance of effective solidarity in the Western Hemisphere in unhappy, uncertain days like these. Mutually happy and healthy Pan American relationships are indispensable. They must be conserved. It ought to be entirely possible to substantially improve these economical relationships through the triangular trade that should be possible of development in connection with this European recovery plan.

Second. This act largely depends for its success upon the quality of its administration. The choice of the administrator and his associates is one of the most solemn responsibilities that has ever confronted a President of the United States. I beg of the President to search for the best and to be satisfied with nothing less. This act is a challenge to the best brains and to the best experience in the Nation. They responded in the crises of war. I am sure they will respond in this crisis of peace. The cause is no less vital to our destiny.

Third. This act depends, again, for its success upon the prompt restoration of western Germany to an effective place in the economy of Europe and the world. It must be decentralized. It must be demilitarized for keeps. But it must be restored to decent hope and productivity. The western occupying powers must quit their indecision and put Germany wholesomely at work again without delay. The Ruhr alone could spell the difference between success and failure.

Fourth. This act depends also and equally upon the energy and devotion with which these western European nations pursue the integration which they have volunteered to seek. Our dollars cannot substitute, I say again, for their own will to make common cause for the mutual defense of their own welfare. We do not presume to dictate the formula. But we relentlessly recommend the objective. Standing together these nations can face every vicissitude with hope. Standing apart they may face collapse and even conquest. By its own warning, the wrecking crew awaits.

Fifth. This act seeks and depends upon peace. Peace requires the economic stabilities which are here addressed. Peace also depends upon security against aggression. Security depends upon preparedness. Preparedness depends upon rival arms until, dependably there is a better way. The better way is an undivided United Nations which is made to work in its present or some other form. Regional arrangements under its charter can promote security. Unselfish mutual defense pacts, such as we have repeatedly offered, can promote security. Global disarmament—on a basis of rigid, instant, and conclusive discipline against bad faith—is the best security guarantee of all. We and the peace-loving sectors of the world must struggle on toward these ideals.

Sixth. The act has the amazingly unified support, according to their official voices before our committee of practically all spokesmen in our own land for organized labor and capital and agriculture and industry, for veterans, for women's organizations, for American journalism and, by no means last, for the church. The friendly preponderance is overwhelming. I believe, Mr. President, that dynamic America is prepared to carry on.

Seventh. Whatever we are to do, Mr. President, let it be done without undue delay. Whatever our answer is to be, let it be made as swiftly as prudence will permit. The exposed frontiers of hazard move almost hourly to the west. Time is of the essence in this battle for peace, even as it is in the battles of a war. Nine months ago Czechoslovakia wanted to join western Europe in this great enterprise for stability and peace. Remember that. Today Czechoslovakia joins only such enterprise as Moscow may direct.

There is only one voice left in the world, Mr. President, which is competent to hearten the determination of the other nations and other peoples in western Europe to survive in their own choice of their own way of life. It is our voice. It is in part the Senate's voice. Surely we can all agree, whatever our shades of opinion, that the hour has struck for this voice to speak as soon as possible. I pray it speaks for weal and not for woe.

The committee has rewritten the bill to consolidate the wisdom shed upon the problem from many sources. It is the final product of 8 months of more intensive study by more devoted minds than I have ever known to concentrate upon any one objective in all my 20 years in Congress. It has its foes—some of whom compliment it by their transparent hatreds. But it has its friends—countless, prayerful friends not only at the hearthstones of America, but under many other flags. It is a plan for peace, stability, and freedom. As such, it involves the clear self-interest of the United States. It can be the turning point in history for 100 years to come. If it fails, we have done our final best. If it succeeds, our children and our children's children will call us blessed. May God grant His benediction upon the ultimate event. [Applause on the floor, Senators rising.]

TOWARD SECURING PEACE AND PREVENTING WAR

MR. PRESIDENT, MR. SPEAKER, MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS:

I am here today to report to you on the critical nature of the situation in Europe, and to recommend action for your consideration.

Rapid changes are taking place in Europe which affect our foreign policy and our national security. There is an increasing threat to nations which are striving to maintain a form of government which grants freedom to its citizens. The United States is deeply concerned with the survival of freedom in those nations. It is of vital importance that we act now, in order to preserve the conditions under which we can achieve lasting peace based on freedom and justice.

The achievement of such a peace has been the great goal of this nation.

Almost three years have elapsed since the end of the greatest of all wars, but peace and stability have not returned to the world. We were well aware that the end of the fighting would not automatically settle the problems arising out of the war. The establishment of peace after the fighting is over has always been a difficult task. And even if all the Allies of World War II were united in their desire to establish a just and honorable peace, there would still be great difficulties in the way of achieving that goal.

But the situation in the world today is not primarily the result of the natural difficulties which follow a great war. It is chiefly due to the fact that one nation has not only refused to cooperate in the establishment of a just and honorable peace but — even worse — has actively sought to prevent it.

The Congress is familiar with the course of events.

You know of the sincere and patient attempts of the democratic nations to find a secure basis for peace through negotiation and agreement. Conference after conference has been held in different parts of the world. We have tried to settle the questions arising out of the war on a basis which would permit the establishment of a just peace. You know the obstacles we have encountered. But the record stands as a monument to the good faith and integrity of the democratic nations of the world. The agreements we did obtain, imperfect though they were, have furnished the basis for a just peace — if they had been kept.

But they were not kept.

They have been persistently ignored and violated by one nation.

The Congress is also familiar with the developments concerning the United Nations. Most of the countries of the world have joined together in the United Nations in an attempt to build a world order based on law and not on force. Most of the members support the United Nations earnestly and honestly, and seek to make it stronger and more effective.

One nation, however, has persistently obstructed the work of the United Nations by constant abuse of the veto. That nation has vetoed 21 proposals for action in a little over two years.

But that is not all. Since the close of hostilities, the Soviet Union and its agents have destroyed the independence and democratic character of a whole series of nations in eastern and central Europe.

It is this ruthless course of action, and the clear design to extend it to the remaining free nations of Europe, that have brought about the critical situation in Europe today.

The tragic death of the Republic of Czechoslovakia has sent a shock throughout the civilized world. Now pressure is being brought to bear on Finland, to the hazard of the entire Scandinavian peninsula. Greece is under direct military attack from rebels actively supported by her Communist-dominated neighbors. In Italy, a determined and aggressive effort is being made by a Communist minority to take control of that country. The methods vary, but the pattern is all too clear.

Faced with this growing menace, there have been encouraging signs that the free nations of Europe are drawing closer together for their economic well-being and for the common defense of their liberties.

In the economic field, the movement for mutual self-help to restore conditions essential to the preservation of free institutions is well under way. In Paris, the 16 nations which are cooperating in the European Recovery Program are meeting again to establish a joint organization to work for the economic restoration of western Europe.

The United States has strongly supported the efforts of these nations to repair the devastation of war and restore a sound world economy. In presenting this program to the Congress last December, I emphasized the necessity for speedy action. Every event in Europe since that day has underlined the great urgency for the prompt adoption of this measure.

The Soviet Union and its satellites were invited to cooperate in the European Recovery Program. They rejected the invitation. More than that, they have declared their violent hostility to the program and are aggressively attempting to wreck it.

They see in it a major obstacle to their designs to subjugate the free community of Europe. They do not want the United States to help Europe. They do not even want the 16 cooperating countries to help themselves.

While economic recovery in Europe is essential, measures for economic rehabilitation alone are not enough. The free nations of Europe realize that economic recovery, if it is to succeed, must be afforded some measure of protection against internal and external aggression. The movement toward economic cooperation has been followed by a movement toward common self-protection in the face of the growing menace to their freedom.

At the very moment I am addressing you, five nations of the European community, in Brussels, are signing a 50-year agreement for economic cooperation and common defense against aggression.

This action has great significance, for this agreement was not imposed by the decree of a more powerful neighbor. It was the free choice of independent governments representing the will of their people, and acting within the terms of the Charter of the United Nations.

Its significance goes far beyond the actual terms of the agreement itself. It is a notable step in the direction of unity in Europe for the protection and preservation of its civilization. This development deserves our full support. I am confident that the United States will, by appropriate means, extend to the free nations the support which the situation requires. I am sure that the determination of the free countries of Europe to protect themselves will be matched by an equal determination on our part to help them to do so.

The recent developments in Europe present this nation with fundamental issues of vital importance.

I believe that we have reached a point at which the position of the United States should be made unmistakably clear.

The principles and purposes expressed in the Charter of the United Nations continue to represent our hope for the eventual establishment of the rule of law in international affairs. The Charter constitutes the basic expression of the code of international ethics to which this country is dedicated. We cannot, however, close our eyes to the harsh fact that through obstruction and even defiance on the part of one nation, this great dream has not yet become a full reality.

It is necessary, therefore, that we take additional measures to supplement the work of the United Nations and to support its aims. There are times in world history when it is far wiser to act than to hesitate. There is some risk involved in action — there always is. But there is far more risk in failure to act.

For if we act wisely now, we shall strengthen the powerful forces for freedom, justice, and peace which are represented by the United Nations and the free nations of the world.

I regard it as my duty, therefore, to recommend to the Congress those measures which, in my judgment, are best calculated to give support to the free and democratic nations of Europe and to improve the solid foundation of our own national strength.

First, I recommend that the Congress speedily complete its action on the European Recovery Program. That program is the foundation of our policy of assistance to the free nations of Europe. Prompt passage of that program is the most telling contribution we can now make toward peace.

The decisive action which the Senate has taken without regard to partisan political considerations is a striking example of the effective working of democracy.

Time is now of critical importance. I am encouraged by the information which has come to me concerning the plans for expeditious action by the House of Representatives. I hope that no single day will be needlessly lost.

Second, I recommend prompt enactment of universal training legislation.

Until the free nations of Europe have regained their strength, and so long as Communism threatens the very existence of democracy, the United States must remain strong enough to support those countries of Europe which are threatened with Communist control and police-state rule.

I believe that we have learned the importance of maintaining military strength as a means of preventing war. We have found that a sound military system is necessary in time of peace if we are to remain at peace. Aggressors in the past, relying on our apparent lack of military force, have unwisely precipitated war. Although they have been led to destruction by their misconception of our strength, we have paid a terrible price for our unpreparedness.

Universal training is the only feasible means by which the civilian components of our armed forces can be built up to the strength required if we are to be prepared for emergencies. Our ability to mobilize large numbers of trained men in time of emergency could forestall future conflict and, together with other measures of national policy, could restore stability to the world.

The adoption of universal training by the United States at this time would be unmistakable evidence to all the world of our determination to back the will to peace with the strength for peace. I am convinced that the decision of the American people, expressed through the Congress, to adopt universal training would be of first importance in giving courage to every free government in the world.

Third, I recommend the temporary reenactment of selective service legislation in order to maintain our armed forces at their authorized strength.

Our armed forces lack the necessary men to maintain their authorized strength. They have been unable to maintain their authorized strength through voluntary enlistments, even though such strength has been reduced to the very minimum necessary to meet our obligations abroad and is far below the minimum which should always be available in the continental United States.

We cannot meet our international responsibilities unless we maintain our armed forces. It is of vital importance, for example, that we keep our occupation forces in Germany until the peace is secure in Europe.

There is no conflict between the requirements of selective service for the regular forces and universal training for the reserve components. Selective service is necessary until the solid foundation of universal training can be established. Selective service can then be terminated and the regular forces may then be maintained on a voluntary basis.

The recommendations I have made represent the most urgent steps toward securing the peace and preventing war.

We must be ready to take every wise and necessary step to carry out this great purpose. This will require assistance to other nations. It will require an adequate and balanced military strength. We must be prepared to pay the price of peace, or assuredly we shall pay the price of war.

We in the United States remain determined to seek, by every possible means, a just and honorable basis for the settlement of international issues. We shall continue to give our strong allegiance to the United Nations as the principal means for international security based on law, not on force. We shall remain ready and anxious to join with all nations — I repeat, with all nations — in every possible effort to reach international understanding and agreement.

The door has never been closed, nor will it ever be closed, to the Soviet Union or any other nation which will genuinely cooperate in preserving the peace.

At the same time, we must not be confused about the central issue which confronts the world today.

The time has come when the free men and women of the world must face the threat to their liberty squarely and courageously.

The United States has a tremendous responsibility to act according to the measure of our power for good in the world. We have learned that we must earn the peace we seek just as we earned victory in war, not by wishful thinking but by realistic effort.

At no time in our history has unity among our people been so vital as it is at the present time.

Unity of purpose, unity of effort, and unity of spirit are essential to accomplish the task before us.

Each of us here in this chamber today has a special responsibility. The world situation is too critical, and the responsibilities of this country are too vast, to permit party struggles to weaken our influence for maintaining peace.

The American people have the right to assume that political considerations will not affect our working together. They have the right to assume that we will join hands, wholeheartedly and without reservation, in our efforts to preserve peace in the world.

With God's help we shall succeed.

Don't Resign from the Human Race

Notes on the Third Anniversary of the Atomic Age

AN EDITORIAL

HAVE you ever wondered what you would say if you were suddenly called upon to defend the human race?

Suppose you were invited to participate in a great debate or, better still, a mock court trial called for the purpose of deciding whether the human species had justified its right to survive—whether, on the basis of its virtues and weaknesses, it was actually entitled to the gift of life. Suppose your job was that of attorney for the defense. How would you go about collecting your evidence? What witnesses would you call? What arguments would you use?

You would have the satisfaction, of course, of knowing that you represented the popular side of the argument and that the preponderance of the evidence was with you. But what do you do when you discover at the trial that your opponent has anticipated most of your argument and, indeed, is using it against you? And what do you do when you find yourself gradually being won over by the sheer logic of his position?

Naturally, you had intended, when your turn came, to talk about the dignity and nobility of man, his capacity for great ideas, great works of art, great deeds. You had planned to describe his capacity for evolution and growth and progress. You had planned a long procession of witnesses—men who not only exemplified genius and nobility in themselves, but whose words might be used to support and dramatize your argument. You had planned to summon Aristotle as an example of the Whole Man—one who combined rounded, integrated knowledge with wisdom, and intelligence with conscience; one who understood the elusive but necessary balance between thought and action. And you were especially anxious to offer Aristotle's testimony that man, at his best, was the noblest creature of all. You had planned, too, to bring up Seneca as a witness, so that all might hear him say that man was a social and reasoning animal. You had planned to offer in evidence Longinus's observation that, from the moment of his birth, man had had implanted in him by nature an inextinguishable love for the noble and the good. You had planned. . . .

But all these plans never materialized because your opponent, the prosecuting attorney, admitted their validity at the outset. No one could deny that individual man was capable of great deeds and words, of vast loyalty and integrity and courage. But this, he said, was not the point at issue. He then proceeded to draw a very careful sharp distinction between traits that characterized the individual and traits that characterized the species as a whole.

It was upon this distinction, he said, that he intended to build the main part of his argument. For the central question under consideration concerned the entity that was the human species—the aggregate of men—peoples rather than persons. There could be no doubt, he said, that countless individuals had easily justified the right to survive. Consider, however, that for every symphony or work of art representing individual genius there was an instance of the collective evil of war, or of group injustice in the form of slavery, or starvation or torture. If you were to take the debits and credits on the overall balance sheet of collective man, the final figure would not be in his favor. Nor was there in operation anywhere in the world a group conscience — assuming conscience to be, if not the source, at least the filter, for determinations of right and wrong.

AS soon as group conscience was mentioned, you wondered whether the prosecutor had overlooked religion. What was Christianity if not the very means of developing the group conscience?

But the prosecutor, it appeared, had overlooked nothing. The great tragedy of the past two thousand years, he said, was that man had plucked out of Christianity for his own use whatever seemed easiest and most convenient, ignoring the rest. He had longed for spiritual security and he had seized upon it in Christianity. But that was only one aspect of Christianity. The aspect of ethics in Christianity — the development of a higher morality for himself and the group as a whole, the refinement of conscience—this he conveniently ignored. Thus Christianity became not so much a new way of life which could ennoble individual and group behavior as a heavily subdivided and even competing series of theological systems which man regarded most often as offering preparation for death rather than for life. This particular emphasis also had the effect of causing people to regard Christianity as a convenient cleansing operation for conscience; the burden of wrongdoing could be discarded, thus squaring the individual with society and giving him the conscious or subconscious satisfaction of knowing that other such burdens might similarly be disposed of. There grew up the phenomenon of the double standard in religion—the believing but not practicing Christian.

Fearing it might be thought that he had been too severe in these criticisms, the prosecutor then asked his audience to consider honestly and frankly what the original prophets and disciples might say about Christianity in the light of history. Would they not repeat what has often been said: that Christianity has yet to be tried by mankind; that the forms it has taken are so far removed from the ideas and urgings of its Originator as to raise the question whether the continued use of the term was not actually fraudulent?

In any event, as it concerned the central question of the trial, the prosecutor said there was no evidence for claiming that religion had endowed man with the virtues which might entitle him to feel he had earned and demonstrated his right to survive. Could there be any sharper proof than was apparent in the fact that, in the name of religion itself, mass murders were carried out as one sect vied with the other in interpreting God's will and in spreading, at the point of a much-used sword, the gospel of the good, the true, and the beautiful?

Passing from religious wars to wars in general, the prosecutor asked whether Christianity or other religions had been effective in avoiding conflict in the past, or whether they were effective today in avoiding what would unquestionably be the last of the world's great wars. Here, too, the failure was dramatized by the lack of group conscience. For questions of right and wrong are absorbed and indeed obliterated by the group ego. Thus it was always the group, right or wrong. He referred to Jefferson's belief that no individual has the right to prey upon or commit aggression against the rights of another individual. And yet, what happened to morality when raised to the collective level? What about the individuals inside nations? What about individuals who had no choice but to join in crime and murder because society or the state arrogated to itself exemption from the moral code?

RIGHT there, you might have thought you detected several serious weaknesses in the prosecutor's argument. Wasn't he making the mistake of oversimplifying war? Wouldn't a group be justified in going to war in a just cause? And what would the price of submission be if it failed to respond to the challenge? The American people, for example, could very easily have avoided war if they had been content to be made part of a vast dictatorial system that would have ground each individual into an evil mold. Was that what the prosecutor had in mind?

Here too, however, you quickly discovered that the prosecutor was aware of the need to qualify his argument.

Certainly, he said, a group had the right to defend itself against evil. But even in that case, the evil is represented by other human beings who, collectively, had abandoned morality. For the fact of the matter is that a study of history reveals that when the group acts as a group, such action is more often selfish than altruistic, more often predatory than social. Besides, he pointed out, what really counts is the conduct and the record of humanity as a whole, rather than that of the subdivisions such as developed along national or other group lines. And it was that total appraisal of the human record that was at issue in this trial.

In the light of that appraisal, he continued, it was clear that there could be only one answer to the question under debate. Indeed, he said, what has happened might actually be called the Human Forfeit, for the right to survive was being squandered.

"Here," he said, "we come to what is the presiding fact of this trial. That fact is that the human race has existed until now largely because it has had an ample margin for error. It could make mistakes but never on so large a scale as to threaten its own existence. It could indulge in wars, despoil the earth on which its subsistence depended, engage in massacre, invite disease and plague out of filth and ignorance; it could do all these things, make all these mistakes, again and again, and yet have an ample cushion against ultimate catastrophe. History was lush with the proliferation of error, but always there was room for recovery—and opportunity for further error.

"But today that margin for error has been used up.

"Here is the world, sound as a nut, perfect, not the smallest piece of chaos left, never a stitch nor an end, not a mark of haste, or botching, or second thought; but the theory of the world is a thing of shreds and patches."
—EMERSON.

One more mistake of the type which in the past repeatedly led to war could be the final mistake. The world can no longer afford the fatal mistake of war.

"Yet man persists in clinging to old errors as though they were life's own trophies—at a time when every major move must be the correct one. He has yet to demonstrate the capacity for presiding over experience, whether personal or historical. Thus his trouble is not that he is obsolescent but that he is adolescent. He is not outmoded but immature.

"Consider his own limited intellectual experience. He has been working with organized knowledge for perhaps only a hundred generations or less—and by far the preponderance of that time has been spent in standing still or sliding back. He still lives in almost total ignorance of what he is, how and why he thinks, or what the connection is between body and mind. Though he presides over a vast universe within his own body, billions of cells, an electrical system involving countless millions of connections, a supremely coordinated apparatus for receiving outside stimuli and impressions; though he must operate this universe, he is largely oblivious of its workings, its motivations, its purposes. He resides in it without governing it. He acts as though he were superimposed upon a highly differentiated clot of energy. Not until three centuries ago did he even discover the fact that the dominant fluid of life actually circulated through him. He has only the barest knowledge of the workings of his nervous system, of the reasons why at a certain point growth yields to the degenerative processes, or, indeed, what the degenerative processes actually are. He is still baffled by an activity that occupies almost one third of his lifetime—sleep—about which he has many theories but no knowledge. As for the phenomenon of ideas—which help to differentiate him from the four-legged mammals, birds, and fish—he is as ignorant of their true operation and composition as he was back in the days when his most complicated idea centered around the fashioning of a club.

"He is brilliant and inventive—but precociously so. It is not necessary for me or anyone to document at this time the trite observation that he possesses a fabulous gift for devising gadgets and launching enterprises which he promptly finds himself unable to control. One aspect of this inventiveness, however, is perhaps relevant to this debate. The real significance of the machine age is not that it replaces human labor but that it replaces human thought. No sooner does it become possible for the great mass of men to enjoy several hours of leisure each day than there are a dozen contrivances which jump in to relieve him of creative thought.

"We now have the Triumph of the Distraction. Thought-replacement is already a giant industry—close to being the biggest industry of them all. An open hour in a day's schedule without access to radio, movies, television, or other absorption devices, produces a feeling of helplessness and boredom in the individual bordering on personal panic. But the gadget has yet to be invented that can make man's decisions for him. Where, then, will the hard, deep thinking come from that can give him command over crisis?

"IF man is lacking in knowledge of himself, consider the lack as it concerns his knowledge of others. For nothing is more characteristic of his adolescence than his inability to understand adequately the society of which he is a part, or the techniques by which society can be changed to meet changing conditions. Yet today he is called upon to create the greatest society of all—a world society.

"Could anything be more immature than the willingness of the peoples of the world to continue to live within the unraveling fabric of the nation-state system? Surely no person of sound reason should hesitate for a single moment in discarding the death-laden concept that peace is possible through the retention by individual nations of their ultimate sovereignty. Yet such a concept dominates the thinking and the established structure of the world.

"One might have supposed, after the last war, that there would have occured a volcanic eruption of popular protest against the first sign that the same measures and methods which failed in the past were again in use today, again starting up the tragic cycle.

"One might have supposed that those who were chosen to lead or who found themselves in positions of leadership in the building of the peace would have had some sense of destiny about them, some understanding of the sweep and the meaning of history, some conception of the long and grand jumps that have to be taken in order to realize the promise of tomorrow. One might have supposed that the instinct for survival alone would have caused these leaders to define necessary new goals with fervor and eloquence.

"One might have supposed that the sudden liberation of the greatest and potentially most cataclysmic force known on earth would have touched off a great awakening everywhere, equating fission of the atom with fusion of the human will in the cause of survival. One might have supposed that the need for world government would have risen over the earth like the sun itself, for nothing short of world government could keep expanding nations from colliding inside a shrinking world.

"One might have supposed that there would have been universal recognition that without world government there could be no control of science for destructive purposes. For out of that science in the past three years have come awesome but not inspiring improvements upon the original forms of atomic death. Today, for example, scientific genius has discovered the techniques for creating radioactive rain. It has discovered the techniques for dispersing from the sky vast quantities of radioactive dust particles, not only contaminating entire cities but neatly prolonging the killing ability of atomic energy far beyond the comparatively limited time privileged to the atomic bomb.

"'The cheapness of man,' said Emerson, 'is everyday's tragedy.' We can now kill more in a single day than used to be killed in generations of perpetual conflict. We are on our way towards removing the last barrier that prevents man from converting the earth into a planetary crematorium.

"Man's immaturity is reflected, finally, in what might be called the Four Fascinations that tyrannize him today.

"The First Fascination is the fascination of the mirror. Each people sees itself possessed of such virtues and skills as it is convinced to the death could exist nowhere else in the world. The Americans pride themselves on their skill at shattering the atom, confident that it will take others many years before they can do the same, and deriving a false sense of security from this fact, though they themselves are the most vulnerable major nation of all because of the intensive concentration of their industries and population. The Russians boast of even more fiendish war-making devices, the meanwhile making of their corrupt absolutism a political religion, and attempting to spread that religion through all methods available to them, for they cannot comprehend why other peoples hesitate to make themselves over in their image.

"The Second Fascination is the fascination of apparent reasonableness. Everywhere people are permitting themselves to be hypnotized by what has all the charms of a seemingly logical approach to world problems. They succumb to the apparent reason which holds that the United Nations as presently constituted is adequate to keep the peace. They are lured into investing all their hopes in international conferences, whether with respect to human rights or boundary arrangements, though each conference must be an end unto itself, since nothing that infringes upon national rights need be accepted by the individual nations. They become enamored of official declarations of intent, though not much is said about the machinery to translate intent into action.

"Yet reasonable men say that all this represents progress—as much progress as one ought to expect at this particular stage of the game. And so we acquiesce—acquiesce in the architecture of failure.

"The shame and pity of it is that, to all intents and purposes, the statesmen are doing their best. They are doing their best on the traditional level on which nations have always been accustomed to carry on their affairs—the level of power politics, political and military coalitions, armament preparations, diplomatic maneuvers, treaties, conventions, conferences, pacts. They are doing their best within an outworn and dangerous framework—a framework of limitations rather than of possibilities, a framework which has as its continuing and general objective the winning of the next war rather than the avoidance of it.

"What had to be done was to break through to a new level—to replace conferences with legislative bodies, treaties with law, violations with duly constituted force; in short, the substance of justice and the machinery of justice.

"But that new level has yet to be created.

"The Third Fascination is closely related to the previous two. It is the fascination with difficulty. World government, it is said, will be too difficult. Setting up a system of representation will be too difficult. If what we are looking for is something easy, then nothing will be easier than to slide into an atomic war. Certainly world government will not be easy—either to achieve or to operate. But will it be any easier to undergo another war?

"Meanwhile, we think it less difficult, apparently, to drain off the largest portion of our resources and energies in preparation for the next war; less difficult to build giant industrial plants underground; less difficult to subject our institutions to the heat and pressure of rising tensions which in turn create the occasion for a

"Can anyone imagine anything so ridiculous as this miserable and puny creature—who is not so much as the master of himself but is the butt of all things—and yet who dares to call himself emperor of the universe? And this privilege which he claims for himself of being the single creature in this vast fabric to anticipate its beauty and parts . . . the sole creature who can render thanks to its builder and do the bookkeeping of infinity! Who, I wonder, signed and sealed him this privilege? Let him show us the letter of appointment to this high and noble office." —MONTAIGNE.

IF A SPACE SHIP from Mars were to come within one hundred miles of this planet, this is what the earth would look like. The photograph, first of its kind in history, was taken automatically from a V-2 Navy rocket which took off from the White Sands proving grounds, New Mexico. The area covered in the photograph represents 200,000 square miles; the distance from the base to the curve is nine hundred miles. An outsider, viewing the earth from this height, would have to hypothecate the existence of man. The theories might describe him as an invisible unit of electrical energy—highly agitated, and moving erratically in often-violent clusters over the surface of the earth, from which he extracts his basic energy. Even his cities would resemble little more than a discolored rought spot or mold on the side of an orange. From such a vantage point, "the differences and differentiations [separating man] would seem idiotic to the point of insanity."

corresponding increase in the militarization of government and the steady, piece-by-piece surrender of civil liberties. We think it less difficult to operate vast research and production facilities pressing yet further into techniques for destroying ourselves.

"The Fourth Fascination is with the crisis daydream. There are two such daydreams in vogue today—indulged in so widely as to be readily recognizable. The first daydream is that if only America and Russia could agree, all the world's ills would be cured. It is a daydream because there can be no basic agreement between Russia and America without a higher authority which has the right and the power to mediate between the two, and to carry out its decisions through preponderant force if necessary.

"The United Nations as presently constituted offers no such enforceable powers. It is not a government but a voluntary association which suffers the grotesque paradox of having as its stated purpose the eradication of war, though guaranteeing the sovereignty of the individual nations, and formalizing that guarantee both through the veto and the right of any nation to relinquish its voluntary membership at its pleasure. Meanwhile, both America and Russia, as the two largest nations in the world, are competing with each other to fill the world power-vacuum, lest it be filled by one to the disadvantage of the other.

"There is nothing strange about this. What confronts us is no more than the standardized behavior of sovereign nations which, either out of the sincere need for self-defense or out of the vicious need for predatory expansion, have to look out for their own. And looking out for one's own today is rapidly taking the form of attempted global domination in one form or another, since the entire earth has become a single theatre of potential military operations.

"World government could not possibly eliminate the natural antagonism between these two countries; it could not possibly eliminate the differences between two contrasting and contradictory ways of life. All world government could do would be to set limits to that natural antagonism between the two: it could halt rigidly and abruptly whatever danger of war might proceed out of the highly volatile competition for military supremacy between the two, whether measured in terms of geographical expansion or the race to perfect and produce weapons of mass destruction. It would limit the war-making ability of each. It would reduce the areas and circumstances of potential conflict. It would establish machinery by which the infringements of one upon the other could be forestalled or blocked. For the function of world government would be to insert itself between the two states, not to merge with them, and to create and keep watch over the rules of the game.

"The second and related daydream belonging to the Fourth Fascination is simpler and more idyllic. It glories in the image of a Russia-less world. If only somehow the earth were to open up tomorrow and swallow the Soviet, according to this dream, all the world's problems would be automatically solved. But the question the daydreamers forget is this: what happened before there was a Soviet Russia?

"Long before the world heard of Lenin and Trotsky and Stalin and Molotov and Vishinsky and Gromyko, the world suffered the disease of war. Why? Why should nations have staggered from conflict to conflict year in and year out, the fact of war remaining the same, only the names of the principals being changed? Expunging

". . . unhappiness is the fatal result not of our need, but of our abundance." —TOLSTOY.

"It is only in society that a man's powers can be called into full activity. Now, to be a useful member of society, one must do two things. Firstly, what everyone is expected to do everywhere; second, what one's own particular position in the world demands and requires."

—SCHOPENAUER.

Russia would not expunge history any more than it would expunge the continuing danger of war. For Soviet Russia today—and the other nations as well—are but actors in a recurring play, acting out parts and lines that are as old as war itself. You don't change the play by changing the cast. If a Russia-less world lacked the machinery to make and enforce law on nations, the world would still be ripe for war. The same would hold true even if Russia and America had the same political systems, for the dynamics of a two-power world are such that neither nation could afford to be at a disadvantage vis-a-vis the other. And security in the world today takes the form of expansion—political or military or both.

Having thus inventoried what he called the "Four Fascinations," the prosecutor stepped down briefly to take a sip of water. As he did so, you could hear general murmuring in the audience. The general tenor of the comment seemed to be that world government was admirable as a goal but that you couldn't get it unless Russia agreed and was willing to join in forming one and in accepting its authority. But, since there was now no authority which could compel Russia to do this, what means could be used to bring it about?

It was fortunate, therefore, that when the prosecutor resumed he proceeded to examine these questions.

He began by saying that obviously world government couldn't be rejected until it was proposed. He said that there was little hope that Soviet Russia—jealous, fearful, insecure internally and externally—might make such a proposal. Moreover, Russia would probably resist going into a world government — unless, and this is the crux of the matter, she was convinced that the rest of the world was determined to set one up, and that any isolation from a world society might come at too high a price morally, politically, economically. The real question, however, concerned not Russia but the United States. Was the United States willing to make the proposal for world government? Was the United States willing to be part of a United Nations having preponderant force and compulsory jurisdiction—committing itself in advance to the decisions of such a law-making body? Wasn't it the United States which insisted on the veto at San Francisco? Didn't the State Department testify before Congress, in early 1948, that the U. S. was unwilling to deprive itself of the veto?

Why did the President of the United States inform Congress that the U.N. lacked the power to deal with a crisis and that, therefore, unilateral measures by America were necessary and justified? And what interpretation is to be placed on this statement in the light of the President's failure to agree to those strengthening measures which would enable the U.N. to meet such emergencies? If the U.N. was, as some American officials have frequently claimed, America's first line of defense, why were we spending hundreds of dollars on military measures for every single dollar we put into the United Nations?

"No; America, like Russia, has so far indicated no unqualified willingness to see the U. N. invested with specific and adequate powers without which it will be impossible to create or maintain the conditions of peace. And unqualified willingness means the acceptance of the only sovereignty in the world today that has any real meaning—the common sovereignty of the peoples.

"What is needed is a popular prodding action of mountainous dimensions which can convince the American government that the American people are ready for and are calling for an open and clearly defined official policy in favor of developing the United Nations into a world government. Then at least, America's moral position in the world will be clear. Then at least and at last the American people can have the peace of mind that comes from knowing that on the biggest issue of our time, on the one cause without which no other cause is possible, their government has lived up to its responsibility as the world's most powerful democracy."

"Law becomes the means whereby the mobility of individual man can assert itself in the group."

—MONTESQUIEU.

AT this point, a short recess was called.

There seemed to be general agreement in the audience that the prosecutor had built up an impressive case, but, as people began to think and talk about it, it occurred to them that there was perhaps a basic contradiction in his argument. In the early portion of his presentation, he had emphasized man's failure to create a group conscience. Later, he emphasized the need for world government. Hence the possible contradiction. What point would there be in setting up a world government only to have it crack up because man lacked the collective conscience necessary to operate it?

Apparently, the prosecutor overheard some of this comment, for when he resumed and launched into his summation, he took up those very questions.

"It has not been my purpose at this trial," he began, "to present a general indictment against the human race. My purpose has been to touch upon some of those aspects of its history that bear directly on the question of the trial; has man justified his right to survive?

"I place special emphasis upon the word justified because I have deliberately avoided any opinion as to whether he will survive. That question falls more properly within the argument of the attorney for the defense.

"I have attempted at this trial to call attention to certain conspicuous failings in man's habits and conditioning and attitudes—please note that I do not say his nature—which so far have caused him great travail and anguish. I have tried to suggest that those failings have been serious in the past, but are critical now because of a fast-vanishing margin for error.

"It may have been observed that I have attempted to take an almost extra-planetary view of man. I have attempted, in general, to view him in his collective being, rather than as Americans or Russians or Englishmen or Frenchmen or Chinese or Indians or Africans and so on. It is easy but dangerous to be caught up in the passions and pressures that grow out of national differentiations. The differences between East and West that split the world today may seem deep and real to those who are involved in them. But viewed from the outside, the differences and the differentiations would seem idiotic to the point of insanity.

"To the outsider there would be only the entity of mankind. If he were to seek an objective and rational explanation for the authorized mass murder of war, or for the staggering lack of political and social justice in the world, or for the clustered misery and starvation that curse man's existence, the outsider would find it inconceivable that only one species was involved. He would be certain that some competing species was preying upon man—and perhaps vice-versa.

"Might I suggest, without encroaching upon the arguments of my opponent, that some such objective view by man of himself might help him avoid his final error.

"One more point. In the course of my remarks, I have referred to the flaw in man's development which has prevented him from creating an adequate basis for existence within the group, as well as between groups. I have been concerned with his failure to invest the group with an essential moral code or conscience.

"I have also referred to his failure so far to recognize that only world government can avert the war now impending.

"There is a direct connection between the two. The immediate objective, the immediate problem, is world government. It offers the means by which the peoples of the world can build a floor over quicksand for a few years. It offers the world a chance to break away from the inevitability of war. It offers a chance to do some hard thinking and to gain the perspective and wisdom necessary for the attainment of the indispensable and ultimate objective.

"That objective is the development and refinement of a collective conscience. In the long run lack of it would of course destroy even (or perhaps especially) a world government. But at least world government might serve as the germinating agency for a collective conscience. At least it might provide the means through which a sense of community of the world's peoples can be nurtured. It could invest the term of world citizenship with real meaning. Perhaps a world freed of war might be able eventually to generate new habits of mutuality which could flow into that conscience.

"If you ask whether I believe the human race will actually set up a world government and attempt to develop the conscience necessary to make it a success, I can only say I do not know. I repeat that I have concerned myself here with the unpromising record to date, and with a statement of essentials for the future. I have not ventured to predict whether those essentials would or could be recognized and met.

"For a consideration of that question, however, I now step down in favor of the attorney for the defense."

* * *

WHAT do you do at this point? What do you say? You realize that you have been called upon to define a basis for hope. The argument you had intended to make—that the human race had justified its right to survive—had been fairly well demolished by the prosecutor. You had originally thought of the word "justify" as applying to the inherent virtues of individual man. But the prosecutor had used it more appropriately as applying to man's actual collective capacity, based on experience, to deal with recurring major problems.

Did this mean that there is nothing left to go on, that inevitability is sovereign, and that we might as well resign from the human race?

"Believing as I do that man in the distant future will be a far more perfect creature than he is now, I find it is an intolerable thought that he and all other sentient beings are doomed to complete annihilation after such long-continued slow progress." —DARWIN.

Certainly not. There is a basis for hope. For even if you agreed with everything the prosecutor said, you could properly regard his argument not as obituary but as warning. It was a stern diagnosis but it included a prescription.

Such a prescription is not beyond man's reach. Whatever his limitations may have been in the past, however great the perpetuation of error, the fact of the matter is that what has to be done today is well within his capacity. For what is needed are not superhuman attributes. Man is not being called upon to rearrange the planets or alter the composition of the sun. He is not being called upon to work miracles. He is being called upon to make decisions affecting his own welfare. The only price he has to pay for his survival is decision.

Man is not imprisoned by habit. No one can foretell what great changes in him may be wrought by crisis—once that crisis is recognized and understood.

He has at his command, once he makes the decision to use them, such resources of courage and intelligence as he himself would hardly dare to imagine. "The human individual," said William James, "lives far within his limiits; he possesses powers of various sorts which he habitually fails to use. He energizes below his maximum, and he behaves below his optimum. His life is contracted like the field of vision of an hysteric subject—but with less excuse, for the poor hysteric is diseased, while in the rest of us it is only an inveterate habit—the habit of inferiority to our full self." But once there is the challenge of necessity, he can be "carried over the dam."

Some neurologists contend that the average individual possesses at least four or five times more brain power than he puts to use. They describe huge unused and smooth areas of the brain as constituting vast potential reservoirs of intelligence. They see no arbitrary limits to this capacity for expansion. Only man's own needs and his understanding of those needs can govern that.

The panorama of man's history is not even or flat but heavily patterned and marked with peaks and valleys. On top of those peaks we find forcing-houses of genius; in the valleys we find huts of ignorance and servility. Were the men who lived on the peaks structurally different from those who lived in the valleys? Did they possess different senses, different organs? Hardly. The same group that lived on the peaks during one century might find itself in the valley the next. Why did the Athenians suddenly go into a long slide after the Peloponnesian Wars? Why did China enjoy the greatest flowering of its civilization at precisely the time Europe was stumbling through the Dark Ages? Why did America come to life so brilliantly in the late eighteenth century?

The answer is largely to be found in two of the greatest forces in history, to which Aristotle and Darwin and Spencer and Lamarck and, more recently, Toynbee, have called frequent attention. Those two forces are challenge and response.

What, then, must be done to enable man to recognize the present challenge so that he may respond to it? What must be done to enable him to release and summon those vast reserves of intelligence and courage that can produce the necessary vital decisions?

Perhaps the faculty of anticipation in man could do it.

Let the individual anticipate, if he can, the next war. Let him anticipate the hell of the transient survivors, however few or many. Let him anticipate his place among them—the things he would see and the things he would do.

Let him anticipate the things he would think about. Let him anticipate his disbelief that all this organized insanity should have been allowed to come to pass. Let him anticipate his certainty that all this could have been averted, for he would know then, in retrospect, what should have been done. Let him, most of all, anticipate the problem of living with his conscience.

He would think it fantastic, looking backwards, that anyone anywhere should have concerned himself with anything except the drive to create a world government in time. He would be sickened at the thought that the peoples should have allowed themselves to be persuaded by talk of difficulties and differences in the way of world government. He would be enraged at the reluctance of pygmies in positions of leadership to make the sane moves that had to be made. He would be appalled at the fact that the American nation failed to make the proposal for such a world government. He would know that even if some nations declined, at least all the others might have rallied with America around a moral principle in pooling their sovereignty—enjoying preponderance but keeping the door open and making it clear that the purpose of the common government was a common security under justice.

This is the type of anticipatory wisdom, you might say at the trial, that is needed now. For if we have it now, there will be unlocked within us not only the essential intellectual and physical energies but the first real manifestations of collective conscience. We have nothing to lose but our adolescence.

ANSWERS FOR AMSTERDAM

A Check List of questions to be considered at the Amsterdam Assembly of the World Council of Churches

August 22 — September 4, 1948

To be used with "Pilgrimage to Amsterdam" and the accompanying study outline, "Summons to Amsterdam."

THE AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR THE WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

297 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

THE World Council of Churches will hold its Constituting Assembly at Amsterdam, Holland, from August 22 to September 4, 1948. This historic occasion will bring together official representatives from 127 communions in 39 countries. North America will be represented by 90 official delegates from 32 communions, plus alternates and accredited visitors.

At this Assembly consideration will be given to the four important areas of Christian interest which are noted in this pamphlet. The American Committee for the World Council of Churches is eager to have a wide expression of opinion on these questions from the rank and file of church people. This check list is provided to stimulate discussion and to guide in the expression of opinion.

It is hoped that these questions will be discussed in churches, ministerial associations, ecclesiastical groups, councils of churches, Y.M.C.A.s, Y.W.C.A.s, men's brotherhoods, women's societies, Bible classes, young people's groups, student associations, theological seminaries and other groups interested in these vital questions. The four topics furnish the basis for four sessions, for each of which careful preparation should be made, with assignments of reading and discussion responsibility.

After discussion, the leader or some other member of the group should check on the following pages the statements which reflect the mind of the group, noting at the bottom of the last page the information requested regarding the leader and those participating. Replies should preferably come from group discussions, though individual expressions of opinion also will be welcome. The pamphlet should then be mailed to the American Committee for the World Council of Churches, 297 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N. Y. All replies should reach New York not later than July 1, 1948. A compilation then will be made of the replies received.

The following two books which have been prepared by the American Committee for the World Council will be found useful in providing information and suggestion for the answering of the questions in this pamphlet: Pilgrimage to Amsterdam by H. G. G. Herklots and Henry Smith Leiper ($1.00); and Summons to Amsterdam, a Study Outline by Charles H. Corbett (25c). In addition, Man's Disorder and God's Design by John C. Bennett (25c) which outlines the preparatory program of study for the Assembly, will be found useful. These may be obtained from the office of the American Committee at the above address.

Approximately 250 individuals from North America will attend the Amsterdam Assembly. They come from various localities in the United States and Canada. In many instances they will be able to give leadership to these discussion groups. The names of those who expect to attend may be obtained from the New York office of the American Committee. Contact should be made direct with these individuals if their help is desired.

Discussion of these questions will provide an appropriate Lenten or post-Lenten project in many churches.

Further information and additional copies of this folder may be obtained gratis from the American Committee for the World Council of Churches, 297 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

I. THE UNIVERSAL CHURCH IN GOD'S DESIGN

Check below the statements which most closely approximate your own ideas.

The Value of the Church

..... 1. The Church is an institution which has outlived its usefulness.

..... 2. The Church, in spite of its shortcomings, furnishes the moral and spiritual foundations needed today for the individual and society.

..... 3. The Church is the only hope for the individual and society in the present troubled world.

The Nature of the Church

..... 4. The Church is an association of Christian believers.

..... 5. The Church is a divinely established institution which as "the body of Christ," is the instrument of His will and work in the world.

..... 6. The Church is the exclusive channel of salvation.

The Quality of the Church

..... 7. The Church, in spirit and program, is satisfactorily doing God's work in the world.

..... 8. The Church needs a new spirit of repentance and faith if it is to fulfill God's will in this present world.

..... 9. The primary test of the Church is the quality of the Christian life exhibited in the local parish.

The Unity of the Church

..... 10. The Church can never be united effectively because of the basic differences within it.

..... 11. The churches have sufficient in common to make unity possible.

..... 12. The unity of the Church should be in spirit and program rather than in ecclesiastical organization.

..... 13. Christian believers should be organically united in one great universal Church.

II. GOD'S DESIGN AND MAN'S WITNESS

Check below the statements which most closely approximate your own ideas.

The Heart of the Christian Witness

The Christian witness is to:

..... 1. The revelation in Jesus Christ of the love and mercy and purpose of God.

..... 2. The redemption of the world from sin through the blood of Christ.

..... 3. The Word of God as the exclusive record of God's revelation to Man.

..... 4. The Church as the divine institution through which alone salvation is given to man.

..... 5. The Person and Work of Jesus Christ as the ground of our hope and the example for our life.

..... 6. The Kingdom of God, the divine order proclaimed by Christ which is immediate in its reality and final as the goal of human destiny.

The Scope of the Witness

..... 7. The Church should concern itself with giving the Gospel to the unnumbered millions who have never heard of Christ.

..... 8. The Church should limit itself to purifying and vitalizing its own life, leaving the non-Christian world to its present religions.

..... 9. The Church should devote itself exclusively to bearing witness to Christ's power to save the individual soul.

..... 10. The whole of human life both individual and social should come within the scope of the Christian gospel.

Hindrances to the Witness

Which of the following seem to you the most important hindrances to the Christian Witness today:

..... 11. The totalitarian philosophy which exalts the State rather than God.

..... 12. The spirit of secularism which tends to limit reality to the material realm.

..... 13. The confusion and suffering of the present world which deaden spiritual sensibilities.

..... 14. The strength of non-Christian religions.

..... 15. The sincere skepticism of earnest people regarding Christian beliefs.

..... 16. The nominal Christians in the Church.

..... 17. The impression that the Church is on the side of privilege and does not fundamentally care about the common people.

..... 18. The divisions within the Church which weaken its impact upon the world.

Methods of Witnessing

The most effective method of witnessing is:

..... 19. The contact of person with person.

..... 20. The regular worship services of the Church.

PREAMBLE

THE Parties to this Treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and their desire to live in peace with all peoples and all governments.

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

They seek to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area.

They are resolved to unite their efforts for collective defense and for the preservation of peace and security.

They therefore agree to this North Atlantic Treaty:

Article 1

The Parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

Article 2

The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

Article 3

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the Parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Article 4

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

Article 5

The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the Party or Parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other Parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Article 6

For the purpose of Article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the Parties is deemed to include an armed attack on the territory of any of the Parties in Europe or North America, on the Algerian departments of France, on the occupation forces of any Party in Europe, on the islands under the jurisdiction of any Party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer or on the vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the Parties.

Article 7

This Treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way the rights and obligations under the Charter of the Parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 8

Each Party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the Parties or any third state is in conflict with the provisions of this Treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with this Treaty.

Article 9

The Parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5.

Article 10

The Parties may, by unanimous agreement, invite any other European state in a position to further the principles of this Treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area to accede to this Treaty. Any state so invited may become a party to the Treaty by depositing its instrument of accession with the Government of the United States of America. The Government of the United States of America will inform each of the Parties of the deposit of each such instrument of accession.

Article 11

This Treaty shall be ratified and its provisions carried out by the Parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes. The instruments of ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the Government of the United States of America, which will notify all the other signatories of each deposit. The Treaty shall enter into force between the states which have ratified it as soon as the ratifications of the majority of the signatories, including the ratifications of Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, have been deposited and shall come into effect with respect to other states on the date of the deposit of their ratifications.

Article 12

After the Treaty has been in force for ten years, or at any time thereafter, the Parties shall, if any of them so requests, consult together for the purpose of reviewing the Treaty, having regard for the factors then affecting peace and security in the North Atlantic area, including the development of universal as well as regional arrangements under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 13

After the Treaty has been in force for twenty years, any Party may cease to be a party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the Government of the United States of America, which will inform the Governments of the other Parties of the deposit of each notice of denunciation.

Article 14

This Treaty, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that Government to the Governments of the other signatories.

In witness whereof, the undersigned plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty.

Done at Washington, the day of April, 1949.

THE INTERNATIONALIZATION OF JERUSALEM

Background of the Controversy

The Palestine question which has figured continuously in United Nations debate for the past two and a half years has emerged as a crucial issue at this session of the General Assembly.

The start of the debate over Jerusalem in the Special Political Committee came just five days before the second anniversary of the adoption of the partition plan.

It will be recalled that this plan envisaged the Jerusalem area as an international enclave administered under the supervision of the United Nations Trusteeship Council.

The Jewish Agency representatives at that time acceded to the plan of internationalization in order not to jeopardize the recommendations for Jewish statehood.

However, the specifications of the UN resolution of November 29, 1947 were not followed by the Arab states. Instead, they elected to open hostilities against the Jews. In the war that ensued, Jewish arms prevailed. They not only drove the Arabs out of a territory of 5,600 square miles assigned to Israel by the partition resolution but occupied an additional 1,600 square miles that had been assigned to the Arabs.

As far as Jerusalem was concerned, neither side was able to take the entire city. At the armistice agreement of last spring, King Abdullah of Jordan occupied the Old City of Jerusalem, where 95% of the Holy Places are situated, while Israeli forces held the city of New Jerusalem.

It is not unjust to conclude that the existence of the Jewish state and the fact that New Jerusalem is under Israeli administration is due less to the activity of the UN than to sacrifices of the Jewish defense.

Religious and Historical Factors

To the Christians, Jerusalem is a holy city because of the many shrines and sites associated with the life and death of Jesus Christ; to the Mohammedans because the Haram Es-Sharif area is associated with Mohammed's ascension to heaven. To the Jews, Jerusalem is holy because it was the city of the Temple. However, an additional historical factor must be cited in relation to the Jewish reverence for Jerusalem. Jerusalem has symbolic meaning to the Jews for the glory which was the past, and to some extent, for Jewish hopes for the future.

Even in the middle of the nineteenth century, the Jews constituted a sizeable percentage of the total population of Jerusalem. It was estimated that out of a total population of 18,000 the Jews numbered 5,700.

The New City of Jerusalem was first begun in 1855, when Sir Moses Montefiore, the British Jewish leader obtained permission from the Sultan of Turkey to buy land in Palestine. In 1860, on the land Montefiore purchased, outside of the Old City, buildings were erected with funds left by Judah Touro of New Orleans.

Through the years, the population increased as buildings continuted to be erected. By 1895, the majority of Jerusalem's 28,000 Jews lived outside the Old City. At the outbreak of hostilities in 1947, all the central and educational institutions of Jewish Palestine were concentrated in the new city, including the Jewish Agency, the Keren Hayesod, the Jewish National Fund, the Vaad Leumi, the Hebrew University and various hospitals. Those important buildings gave New Jerusalem all the characteristics of a Capital.

The preponderance of Jews in the New City is indicated by the following figures: in 1922, they numbered 28,000 out of a total population of 40,000; in 1931, 46,000 out of a total of 65,000; in 1936, 74,000 out of 100,000; in 1948, about 95 per cent.

Plan of the UN Conciliation Commission

In December, 1948, the United Nations General Assembly instructed its Conciliation Commission for Palestine to draft a plan for a permanent international regime in the Jerusalem area. This plan was made public in September, 1949. Its main features are:-

Full United Nations' sovereignty in the Jerusalem area.

The Jerusalem area is to be "permanently demilitarized and neutralized."

Each distinctive population group in the area is to enjoy the maximum amount of autonomy compatible with international control. This autonomy is to be administered by the communal authorities.

Access to the Holy Places is to be permanently supervised by UN bodies.

Mass immigration into the Jewish or Arab sectors of the city is to be prohibited. The international regime is to maintain immigration into one sector at the same ratio as that in the other, so as not to disturb the present balance of population between Jews and Arabs.

The Jerusalem area as a whole is to be administered by:

A UN Commissioner appointed by the General Assembly for a term of five years. He would have his own police force which, in addition to ordinary police duties, would ensure free access to the Holy Places, supervise the demilitarization of the area, and protect human rights.

A general council composed of five Jews, five Arabs, and four members of other population groups. The council would have jurisdiction over financial and economic matters and would also deal with problems affecting the general relationship between the various autonomous population groups.

An international tribunal of three judges and one deputy, elected by the UN General Assembly, empowered to determine issues arising between the communal authorities in the Jerusalem area and between the UN Commissioner and the Israeli and Arab governments. It would also interpret the basic statute establishing the international regime.

Sharp criticism of this plan which immediately followed its publication caused the Conciliation Commission for Palestine to issue an official interpretation of it in November, 1949. According to this interpretation, the plan "leaves to the governments of the adjoining states virtually all powers of government within the Arab and Jewish parts of Jerusalem. Accordingly, the inhabitants of the area would retain their present nationalities and would continue to enjoy all the rights and duties entailed in such a nationality." Thus the plan contemplates "only the establishment of an organ of coordination for matters of common interest to the two parts of the city which would in practice have only consultative and advisory functions with the Arab and Jewish authorities."

Arab Reaction

Except for Lebanon, the Arab countries had never indicated until November that they were ready to accept the internationalization of Jerusalem. The failure of the General Assembly to adopt the temporary trusteeship plan for the city (May 14, 1948) was attributed in part to Arab opposition. At the plenary session of the General Assembly, Egypt, Syria, Iraq and Yemen attacked the temporary UN trusteeship plan proposed by the United States and France -- and all seven of them, including Lebanon voted against it. The only Arab representative who endorsed internationalization the following May was Dr. Charles Malik of Lebanon, himself a Christian and representing a Christian-Arab country.

In mid-November, 1949, at Lake Success, before the Assembly's fifty-nine nation Special Political Committee, all the Arab states except Jordan came out for internationalization. To what extent inter-Arab malice and suspicions prompted some Arab countries to oppose Abdullah and support internationalization is speculative. In any event, on November 26, 1949, the Government of Jordan informed the United Nations that it would not pull its troops out of Jerusalem nor agree to any change in the present system of divided Israeli-Jordanian control over the Holy City. "This major declaration made to the General Assembly's Special Political Committee by Fouzi Pasha el Mulki clarified at last the long-standing puzzle over Jordan's approach to a Jerusalem solution." (NY Times, November 27, 1949)

Israeli Reaction

The position of the Israelis had been clarified through a number of statements over a considerable period. At the Third session of the General Assembly in Paris last year, the Israeli representative had proposed that internationalization be limited in area and apply only to that part of the city which contained the greatest concentration of religious and historic shrines.

Again on April 23, 1949, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, the president of Israel, had said

"The Government and people of Israel are conscious of the international interest in the safety of the Holy Places and the right of free access to them. We pledge ourselves to ensure full security for religious institutions in the exercise of their functions; to grant the supervision of the Holy Places by those who hold them sacred; and to encourage and accept the fullest international safeguards and controls for their immunity and protection. Just as we are resolved to give complete and practical expression to the universal interest arising from the Holy Places, so we expect that the international community will understand the direct and inescapable responsibility which Israel bears and exercises in the daily life and administration of Jewish Jerusalem. I am satisfied that no real incompatibility exists between the interests and concerns of Christianity, in which His Holiness the Pope has recently given eloquent expression, and the aspirations of the people of Jerusalem to assure their government and security in conformity with their national allegiance.

If there is a genuine desire to reconcile these two interests, a harmonious solution can swiftly be secured with international consent."

On May 5, 1949 Israel's representative Aubrey Eban, in addressing the Political Committee of the General Assembly, suggested that the solution for Jerusalem should be sought in an international regime which would apply to the whole city, but which would be restricted functionally to concern itself only with the control and protection of the Holy Places and not with any purely secular or political aspects of life and government. After emphasizing that his Government uphold the necessity "to which attention was drawn in the Pope's recent encyclical to ensure free access to the Holy Places, the security of Catholic and other Christian institutions, and to accept and encourage full international control for the protection and immunity of the Holy Places," he added: "The Government of Israel advocates and supports the establishment by the United Nations of an international regime for Jerusalem concerned exclusively with the control and protection of the Holy Places and sites. If such a regime for the Holy Places is established, my Government will cooperate with it." The Government of Israel, he further declared, "is prepared to offer the fullest safeguards and guarantees for the security of religious institutions in the exercise of their functions."

Similar declarations continued to be made by Israeli leaders, and on November 15, 1949, Israel submitted a thirty-six page memorandum to the Special Political Committee of the General Assembly, rejecting the draft statute of the Conciliation Commission. Israel told the United Nations that an international regime would "convulse the city in widespread discontent and confusion." The memorandum stated in regard to demilitarization of Jerusalem: "There is no vital aspect of Israel's essential authority in Jerusalem which would not disintegrate if the plan were put into practice. The memorandum taxed the entire plan as impractical, as nullifying the Israel-Jordanian armistice agreement and reaffirmed Israel's readiness to negotiate with the UN for international guarantees of free access to the holy places under her jurisdiction.

On November 25, 1949, Moshe Sharett, Foreign Minister of Israel, declared to the Special Political Committee that Israel could not accept internationalization of the New City. He argued that Israel had held Jerusalem at a great sacrifice in human lifes, that Jerusalem is now an integral part of the Jewish state and cannot be relinquished without jeopardizing Israel's security. Mr. Sharett said: "Left to fight it out or surrender, the Jews fought and won. What they regained was not merely their stake in Jerusalem but the link between it and the State of Israel."

The Soviet Union Reaction

The Soviet Union, which has puzzled observers in its repeated shifts of attitude towards Israel, demanded on November 29, 1949, that the United Nations General Assembly proceed with the plan for the international administration of the Jerusalem area contained in the Palestine partition resolution adopted two years ago.

The Soviet representative, Semyon K. Tsarapkin, charged in the Assembly's Special Political Committee that the Conciliation Committee's proposals constituted an attempt by the United States and Britain to gain control over an important military and strategic center.

Mr. Tsarapkin's statements were interpreted generally to mean that the Soviet Union had swung away from Israel to win support among the Arabs. The only Arab country he attacked was Jordan, which strongly rejects internationalization. The Soviet representative charged that King Abdullah was a tool of Britain and "renewed earlier Soviet proposals for the establishment of a Palestine Arab state" (NY Times, Nov. 30, 1949).

The Catholic Attitude

Another factor in the Jerusalem situation is the attitude of the Catholic Church. Various pronouncements by the Vatican were summarized in a statement issued by the Roman Catholic hierarchy in the United States on November 18, 1949.

> "The question of the status of Jerusalem and the Holy Places, now before the United Nations," the statement says in part, "(is) pre-eminently religious in character..."

On this basis, the statement declares:-

> "Our Holy Father, Pope Pius XII, time and time again has made it clear that the only effective guarantee for the safety, and the sacred character of Jerusalem, for the protection of the Holy Places, and for the free exercise of the indisputable rights of a Christian minority, and for free access of pilgrims to their Shrines, is a territorial internationalization of Jerusalem and its area under the sovereignty and the effective control of the family of nations."

The Position of the American Jewish Committee

In the present Jerusalem situation, the two directly interested parties -- Israel and Jordan -- are opposed to the Conciliation Commission's plan. The UN could hardly impose this plan upon these parties. It seems unlikely, furthermore, that the plan can obtain the necessary two-thirds majority vote in the General Assembly. For among UN delegates who are concerned with strengthening the world organization -- and these include delegates who favor the plan -- there are grave doubts whether the UN can, at the present time, successfully assume administrative, economic and police responsibilities for an area like Jerusalem.

The American Jewish Committee believes that it would be more statesmanlike for the General Assembly, at its present session, to work out a scheme for the internationalization of the Holy Places under UN jurisdiction while leaving the general problem of sovereignty over the Jerusalem area to be determined by negotiations between Israel and Jordan under the guidance of the Conciliation Commission.

As the representatives of the world community, UN's main interest in Jerusalem are the Holy Places. The Israeli government has time and again offered to negotiate an agreement with the UN which would fully secure the internationalization and international protection of the Holy Places by a UN body. Such an agreement could be worked out with Israel for the New City, where there are only a few Holy Places, and with Jordan for the Old City, where most of the Holy Places are located.

Trend (December 8, 1949)

According to the New York Times (December 8th), the Special Political Committee of the United Nations General Assembly today voted by an impressive margin to create a permanent international regime in Jerusalem. The city and its environs would form a separate enclave under the administration of the Trusteeship Council.

This decision was taken upon the very nearly solid bloc voting of the South American countries, Arab states and the Soviet bloc. The final count was 35 to 13, with 11 abstentions.

The United States and Britain led the opposition. The vote marked the second defeat of the United States in two days by the Latin-American republics. The other came yesterday on the question of China.

Wins by More Than Two-Thirds

Even the most sanguine supporters of the Jerusalem project, originally introduced as a resolution by Australia, were surprised at the strength of the endorsement it received in committee. The plan won more than two-thirds of the votes cast and, therefore, is expected to be adopted by the Assembly in plenary session, probably Friday. A majority vote is necessary in committee and two-thirds for matters of substance in the Assembly itself.

ATOMIC SCIENCE

. . . wrapped up in just six titles

From time to time, '48 will ask a leading authority in a field of current interest to select a short list of readable books which provide a sound understanding of the subject. Following is the first in the series. Readers are invited to suggest subjects.

IN MY OPINION, no one can approach the subject of atomic energy—the most important problem in the world today—from a merely scientific and technical point of view. It seems to me that it is not enough to know all about isotopes and pitchblende and plutonium. The whole of human destiny is entwined in this subject. That is why, in proposing a bibliography within the reach of every reader, and one that any reader could find time to encompass, I have included, besides scientific and historical sources, three books on the problems of peace, security, and the continued life of man with man.

My selections are:

Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, published monthly by the Atomic Scientists of Chicago, 1126 E. 59 St., Chicago, Ill. Yearly subscription, $2.50; also available at some newsstands, 25c per copy.

Personally, I find the Bulletin the most valuable single source of up-to-date information on atomic energy. It reports progress on its use and control. It analyzes the divergences of view between the U.S., the U.S.S.R., and other nations, as well as the hopes for progress. It reviews Army and Navy thinking on atomic warfare. It reports developments in peaceful uses of atomic energy.

Selig Hecht, Explaining the Atom, Viking Press, 1947, $2.75.

An authoritative account of the scientific steps, both theoretical and experimental, that have led to our present knowledge of nuclear fission, by a distinguished colleague of mine who took part in many of them. In this book, the late Selig Hecht provides, in very simple language, the necessary information for a layman to form an independent opinion on the practical problems of atomic energy confronting the world today.

John Hersey, Hiroshima, Alfred A. Knopf, 1946, $1.75.

A vivid description of the impact of the atomic bomb on a community of men, women, and children. This book describes in terms of human experience the fate of people subjected to atomic bombing.

Cord Meyer, Jr., Peace or Anarchy, Little, Brown, 1947, $2.50.

This book reviews in a very complete manner the whole complex of problems connected with peace and security. It includes what I consider to be an honest discussion of the political and social implications of the atomic bomb.

Emery Reves, The Anatomy of Peace, Harper, 1945, $2.00.

This book takes up the whole problem of peace against a broad background of world history. The author presents convincingly the necessity for world government as the only effective solution of the security problem. Is there any other solution?

Raymond Swing, In the Name of Sanity, Harper, 1946, $1.00.

Based on a series of broadcasts, this book contains analytical and critical discussions of important events in the months immediately following the release of the news of the atomic energy discoveries. It is excellent, I think, for a day-to-day account of the most important events affecting the development of national and international policy on atomic power. END

ATOMIC WAR OR PEACE

By ALBERT EINSTEIN

As told to RAYMOND SWING

SINCE the completion of the first atomic bomb nothing has been accomplished to make the world more safe from war, while much has been done to increase the destructiveness of war. I am not able to speak from any firsthand knowledge about the development of the atomic bomb, since I do not work in this field. But enough has been said by those who do to indicate that the bomb has been made more effective. Certainly the possibility can be envisaged of building a bomb of far greater size, capable of producing destruction over a larger area. It also is credible that an extensive use could be made of radioactivated gases which would spread over a wide region, causing heavy loss of life without damage to buildings.

I do not believe it is necessary to go on beyond these possibilities to contemplate a vast extension of bacteriological warfare. I am skeptical that this form presents dangers comparable with those of atomic warfare. Nor do I take into account a danger of starting a chain reaction of a scope great enough to destroy part or all of this planet. I dismiss this on the ground that if it could happen from a man-made atomic explosion it would already have happened from the action of the cosmic rays which are continually reaching the earth's surface.

BUT it is not necessary to imagine the earth being destroyed like a nova by a stellar explosion to understand vividly the growing scope of atomic war and to recognize that unless another war is prevented it is likely to bring destruction on a scale never before held possible and even now hardly conceived, and that little civilization would survive it.

In the first two years of the atomic era another phenomenon is to be noted. The public, having been warned of the horrible nature of atomic warfare, has done nothing about it, and to a large extent has dismissed the warning from its consciousness. A danger that cannot be averted had perhaps better be forgotten; or a danger against which every possible precaution has been taken also had probably better be forgotten. That is, if the United States had dispersed its industries and decentralized its cities, it might be reasonable for people to forget the peril they face.

I SHOULD say parenthetically that it is well that this country has not taken these precautions, for to have done so would make atomic war still more probable, since it would convince the rest of the world that we are resigned to it and are preparing for it. But nothing has been done to avert war, while much has been done to make atomic war more horrible; so there is no excuse for ignoring the danger.

I say that nothing has been done to avert war since the completion of the atomic bomb, despite the proposal for supranational control of atomic energy put forward by the United States in the United Nations. This country has made only a conditional proposal, and on conditions which the Soviet Union is now determined not to accept. This makes it possible to blame the failure on the Russians.

But in blaming the Russians the Americans should not ignore the fact that they themselves have not voluntarily renounced the use of the bomb as an ordinary weapon in the time before the achievement of supranational control, or if supranational control is not achieved. Thus they have fed the fear of other countries that they consider the bomb a legitimate part of their arsenal so long as other countries decline to accept their terms for supranational control.

AMERICANS may be convinced of their determination not to launch an aggressive or preventive war. So they may believe it is superfluous to announce publicly that they will not a second time be the first to use the atomic bomb. But this country has been solemnly invited to renounce the use of the bomb—that is, to outlaw it— and has declined to do so unless its terms for supranational control are accepted.

I believe this policy is a mistake. I see a certain military gain from not renouncing the use of the bomb in that this may be deemed to restrain another country from starting a war in which the United States might use it. But what is gained in one way is lost in another. For an understanding over the supranational control of atomic energy has been made more remote. That may be no military drawback so long as the United States has the exclusive use of the bomb. But the moment another country is able to make it in substantial quantities, the United States loses greatly through the absence of an international agreement, because of the vulnerability of its concentrated industries and its highly developed urban life.

In refusing to outlaw the bomb while having the monopoly of it, this country suffers in another respect, in that it fails to return publicly to the ethical standards of warfare formally accepted previous to the last war. It should not be forgotten that the atomic bomb was made in this country as a preventive measure; it was to head off its use by the Germans, if they discovered it. The bombing of civilian centers was initiated by the Germans and adopted by the Japanese. To it the Allies responded in kind—as it turned out, with greater effectiveness—and they were morally justified in doing so. But now, without any provocation, and without the justification of reprisal or retaliation, a refusal to outlaw the use of the bomb save in reprisal is making a political purpose of its possession. This is hardly pardonable.

I AM not saying that the United States should not manufacture and stockpile the bomb, for I believe that it must do so; it must be able to deter another nation from making an atomic attack when it also has the bomb. But deterrence should be the only purpose of the stockpile of bombs. In the same way I believe that the United Nations should have the atomic bomb when it is supplied with its own armed forces and weapons. But it too should have the bomb for the sole purpose of deterring an aggressor or rebellious nation from making an atomic attack. It should not use the atomic bomb on its own initiative any more than the United States or any other power should do so. To keep a stockpile of atomic bombs without promising not to initiate its use is exploiting the possession of the bombs for political ends. It may be that the United States hopes in this way to frighten the Soviet Union into accepting supranational control of atomic energy. But the creation of fear only heightens antagonism and increases the danger of war. I am of the opinion that this policy has detracted from the very real virtue in the offer of supranational control of atomic energy.

We have emerged from a war in which we had to accept the degradingly low ethical standards of the enemy. But instead of feeling liberated from his standards, and set free to restore the sanctity of human life and the safety of noncombatants, we are in effect making the low standards of the enemy in the last war our own for the present. Thus we are starting toward another war degraded by our own choice.

IT MAY be the public is not fully aware that in another war atomic bombs will be available in large quantities. It may measure the dangers in the terms of the three bombs exploded before the end of the last war. The public also may not appreciate that, in relation to the damage inflicted, atomic bombs already have become the most economical form of destruction that can be used on the offensive. In another war the bombs will be plentiful and they will be comparatively cheap. Unless there is a determination not to use them that is far stronger than can be noted today among American political and military leaders, and on the part of the public itself, atomic warfare will be hard to avoid. Unless Americans come to recognize that they are not stronger in the world because they have the bomb, but weaker because of their vulnerability to atomic attack, they are not likely to conduct their policy at Lake Success or in their relations with Russia in a spirit that furthers the arrival at an understanding.

BUT I do not suggest that the American failure to outlaw the use of the bomb except in retaliation is the only cause of the absence of an agreement with the Soviet Union over atomic control. The Russians have made it clear that they will do everything in their power to prevent a supranational regime from coming into existence. They not only reject it in the range of atomic energy: they reject it sharply on principle, and thus have spurned in advance any overture to join a limited world government.

Mr. Gromyko has rightly said that the essence of the American atomic proposal is that national sovereignty is not compatible with the atomic era. He declares that the Soviet Union cannot accept this thesis. The reasons he gives are obscure, for they quite obviously are pretexts. But what seems to be true is that the Soviet leaders believe they cannot preserve the social structure of the Soviet state in a supranational regime. The Soviet government is determined to maintain its present social structure, and the leaders of Russia, who hold their great power through the nature of that structure, will spare no effort to prevent a supranational regime from coming into existence, to control atomic energy or anything else.

The Russians may be partly right about the difficulty of retaining their present social structure in a supranational regime, though in time they may be brought to see that this is a far lesser loss than remaining isolated from a world of law. But at present they appear to be guided by their fears, and one must admit that the United States has made ample contributions to these fears, not only as to atomic energy but in many other respects. Indeed this country has conducted its Russian policy as though it were convinced that fear is the greatest of all diplomatic instruments.

THAT the Russians are striving to prevent the formation of a supranational security system is no reason why the rest of the world should not work to create one. It has been pointed out that the Russians have a way of resisting with all their arts what they do not wish to have happen; but once it happens, they can be flexible and accommodate themselves to it. So it would be well for the United States and other powers not to permit the Russians to veto an attempt to create supranational security. They can proceed with some hope that once the Russians see they cannot prevent such a regime they may join it.

So far the United States has shown no interest in preserving the security of the Soviet Union. It has been interested in its own security, which is characteristic of the competition which marks the conflict for power between sovereign states. But one cannot know in advance what would be the effect on Russian fears if the American people forced their leaders to pursue a policy of substituting law for the present anarchy of international relations. In a world of law, Russian security would be equal to our own, and for the American people to espouse this wholeheartedly – something that should be possible under the workings of democracy – might work a kind of miracle in Russian thinking.

At present the Russians have no evidence to convince them that the American people are not contentedly supporting a policy of military preparedness which they regard as a policy of deliberate intimidation. If they had evidences of a passionate desire by Americans to preserve peace in the one way it can be maintained, by a supranational regime of law, this would upset Russian calculations about the peril to Russian security in current trends of American thought. Not until a genuine, convincing offer is made to the Soviet Union, backed by an aroused American public, will one be entitled to say what the Russian response would be.

IT MAY be that the first response would be to reject the world of law. But if from that moment it began to be clear to the Russians that such a world was coming into existence without them, and that their own security was being increased, their ideas necessarily would change.

I am in favor of inviting the Russians to join a world government authorized to provide security, and if they are unwilling to join, to proceed to establish supranational security without them. Let me admit quickly that I see great peril in such a course. If it is adopted it must be done in a way to make it utterly clear that the new regime is not a combination of power against Russia. It must be a combination that by its composite nature will greatly reduce the chances of war. It will be more diverse in its interests than any single state, thus less likely to resort to aggressive or preventive war. It will be larger, hence stronger, than any single nation. It will be geographically much more extensive, and thus more difficult to defeat by military means. It will be dedicated to supranational security, and thus escape the emphasis on national supremacy which is so strong a factor in war.

If a supranational regime is set up without Russia, its service to peace will depend on the skill and sincerity with which it is done. Emphasis should always be apparent on the desire to have Russia take part. It must be clear to Russia, and no less so to the nations comprising the organization, that no penalty is incurred or implied because a nation declines to join. If the Russians do not join at the outset, they must be sure of a welcome when they do decide to join. Those who create the organization must understand that they are building with the final objective of obtaining Russian adherence.

THESE are abstractions, and it is not easy to outline the specific lines a partial world government must follow to induce the Russians to join. But two conditions are clear to me: the new organization must have no military secrets; and the Russians must be free to have observers at every session of the organization, where its new laws are drafted, discussed, and adopted, and where its policies are decided. That would destroy the great factory of secrecy where so many of the world's suspicions are manufactured.

It may affront the military-minded person to suggest a regime that does not maintain any military secrets. He has been taught to believe that secrets thus divulged would enable a war-minded nation to seek to conquer the earth. (As to the so-called secret of the atomic bomb, I am assuming the Russians will have this through their own efforts within a short time.) I grant there is a risk in not maintaining military secrets. If a sufficient number of nations have pooled their strength they can take this risk, for their security will be greatly increased. And it can be done with greater assurance because of the decrease of fear, suspicion, and distrust that will result. The tensions of the increasing likelihood of war in a world based on sovereignty would be replaced by the relaxation of the growing confidence in peace. In time this might so allure the Russian people that their leaders would mellow in their attitude toward the West.

MEMBERSHIP in a supranational security system should not, in my opinion, be based on any arbitrary democratic standards. The one requirement from all should be that the representatives to supranational organization—assembly and council—must be elected by the people in each member country through a secret ballot. These representatives must represent the people rather than any government—which would enhance the pacific nature of the organization.

To require that other democratic criteria be met is, I believe, inadvisable. Democratic institutions and standards are the result of historic developments to an extent not always appreciated in the lands which enjoy them. Setting arbitrary standards sharpens the ideological differences between the Western and Soviet systems.

But it is not the ideological differences which now are pushing the world in the direction of war. Indeed, if all the Western nations were to adopt socialism, while maintaining their national sovereignty, it is quite likely that the conflict for power between East and West would continue. The passion expressed over the economic systems of the present seems to me quite irrational. Whether the economic life of America should be dominated by relatively few individuals, as it is, or these individuals should be controlled by the state, may be important, but it is not important enough to justify all the feelings that are stirred up over it.

I should wish to see all the nations forming the supranational state pool all their military forces, keeping for themselves only local police. Then I should like to see these forces commingled and distributed as were the regiments of the former Austro-Hungarian Empire. There it was appreciated that the men and the officers of one region would serve the purposes of empire better by not being stationed exclusively in their own provinces, subject to local and racial pulls.

I should like to see the authority of the supranational regime restricted altogether to the field of security. Whether this would be possible I am not sure. Experience may point to the desirability of adding some authority over economic matters, since under modern conditions these are capable of causing national upsets that have in them the seeds of violent conflict. But I should prefer to see the function of the organization altogether limited to the tasks of security. I also should like to see this regime established through the strengthening of the United Nations, so as not to sacrifice continuity in the search for peace.

I do not hide from myself the great difficulties of establishing a world government, either a beginning without Russia or one with Russia. I am aware of the risks. Since I should not wish it to be permissible for any country that has joined the supranational organization to secede, one of these risks is a possible civil war. But I also believe that world government is certain to come in time, and that the question is how much it is to be permitted to cost. It will come, I believe, even if there is another world war, though after such a war, if it is won, it would be world government established by the victor, resting on the victor's military power, and thus to be maintained permanently only through the permanent militarization of the human race.

But I also believe it can come through agreement and through the force of persuasion alone, hence at low cost. But if it is to come in this way it will not be enough to appeal to reason. One strength of the communist system of the East is that it has some of the character of a religion and inspires the emotions of a religion. Unless the cause of peace based on law gathers behind it the force and zeal of a religion, it hardly can hope to succeed. Those to whom the moral teaching of the human race is entrusted surely have a great duty and a great opportunity. The atomic scientists, I think, have become convinced that they cannot arouse the American people to the truths of the atomic era by logic alone. There must be added that deep power of emotion which is a basic ingredient of religion. It is to be hoped that not only the churches but the schools, the colleges, and the leading organs of opinion will acquit themselves well of their unique responsibility in this regard.

EMERGENCY COMMITTEE OF ATOMIC SCIENTISTS

INCORPORATED

The Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists was organized informally in May, 1946 by a small group of atomic scientists headed by Albert Einstein and Harold C. Urey; the Committee was incorporated in August, 1946. The atomic scientists recognized, because of their unique knowledge, the tremendous new problems which faced mankind through the release of atomic energy. Their purpose in coming together was to arouse the American people to an understanding of the unprecedented crisis in national and international affairs precipitated by the atomic discoveries.

The part they had borne in these discoveries had aroused in scientists a deep sense of responsibility for the immediate and eventual uses to which this great new power might be put. As scientists, working in the interests of their country at a time of national peril, they had released overwhelming new forces. As citizens, they saw that the people were wholly unaware of the supreme implications of this new power, mainly because of the necessity of military security. They believed that the connotations of secrecy, national rivalry, and mass destruction that unavoidably attached to the atomic discoveries from their inception must be removed, that men might determine the future use and control of atomic energy in an atmosphere of free and democratic discussion.

During the year that has passed, every member of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists has done his utmost to bring home to the people of the United States the simple facts of atomic energy and their tremendous implications for world peace or world destruction. By conference and letter this small group of men have reached directly over a quarter of a million key citizens. To reach a wider audience, they have the willing cooperation of hundreds of younger scientists who, forming themselves into the Association of Scientists for Atomic Education, have sent out teams of speakers to bring to large cities and small towns in simple concrete terms the facts of atomic energy. Their work is complemented by the nationwide educational effort of the National Committee on Atomic Information, likewise formed at the urgent behest of leading atomic scientists.

Also financed by the Committee is the uniquely valuable Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, which month by month presents and appraises every important proposal for international control, whether emanating from government or private sources. The Bulletin is perhaps the most valuable existing medium for disseminating information and opinion on atomic energy control. It reaches those who are responsible for governmental policy both in the United States and abroad, carrying to them the thoughtful conclusions of the world's leading atomic scientists.

To date over 11,000 private individuals have subscribed nearly $400,000 to this educational effort in the interest of national and world understanding of the momentous issues at stake. Fully to implement its educational campaign the Committee seeks a minimum of $1,000,000.

It is the unanimous belief of the members of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists that such a nation-wide educational campaign provides the only assurance that public attention will be focused on the paramount necessity of securing effective international control to safeguard our civilization.

Atlanta Housing:
A Study of Patterns, Changes and Mechanisms Controlling Negro Housing

By

Samuel L. Adams

December 1966

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The research and writing of this report benefits greatly from the help of many individuals and organizations. Notably among them were Harry Adley, President of Adley Associates, Inc. (Urban Planning Consultants); Robert Thompson, Assistant to the Regional Administrator, Region III of the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development; Jack Wood and Edward Rutledge, Associate Directors of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing; Dr. Leslie Dunbar, former head of Southern Regional Council and now Executive Director of the Field Foundation; Mrs. Eliza Paschall, Director of Atlanta Council in Human Relations, and W. L. Calloway, President of Empire Real Estate Board.

FOREWORD

"The greatness of our country rests upon the principle of equal opportunity for all."*

That is the succinct way in which Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen emphasized the need for "real" and full democracy for all Americans in all sectors of their lives--economic, religious, political, and recreational. Commenting on Atlanta's needs and performance in the housing sector, the Mayor said:

"We must have the spaces for our citizens to live as well as places for them to make a living...Congestion of population can become a deadly deterrent to progress."

The Mayor of Atlanta obviously recognized the moral as well as the practical compulsions for equal opportunity for the city's minority group members, but he also realized that in the sector of housing a solution to the problems would be difficult. He pointed out that neighborhood transitions constitute one of the most delicate and difficult problems facing the city.

This study--an assessment of Negro housing in Atlanta--attempts to put these problems into clearer prospective. Our conclusions may be disappointing to some who are accustomed to thinking of Atlanta as a city "too busy to hate." For there emerges here a pattern of residential segregation that admittedly in the past was promulgated by some city officials, and financial and real estate leaders, and which continues today despite the best intentions of others.

The gravity of the problem--especially prior to Atlanta's 1966 clash between police and residents of the city's Summerhill slum area--appears not to have been seen, a blindness that might have developed because the city was "too busy to see," and may be "too busy to care."

INTRODUCTION

My 6-year-old son returned home from school on day last month and engaged his mother in serious conversation.

Mama," he said, "Do you know why I didn't want you to take me into the zoo when we were out riding yesterday? I was scared those white people might say something to you and hurt your feelings."

Then he told of being chased home a half hour earlier by some larger boys. "They throw things on me and call me names. I wish I was white so they wouldn't do it."

Thoroughly disturbed by his remarks, his mother explained about how God had made him and about the desirability of being "what He made us," but that failed to change his young mind. He already had learned by precept and example, some perhaps internalized from his immediate family, that there might be advantages if he were white. He had been to the Madison zoo on other occasions with the white family he calls "his best friends," and for some reason he felt that "Brad's mama" could take him to the zoo without any prospect of insults.

How did these race concepts develop and what contributed to them? Madison is a friendly town not noted for obvious race prejudice. Yet my son was primed to observe differential treatment among his playmates and to base it on race while at the same time selecting someone who is white as his best friend.

I saw the development of this psychological set when he was 5 years old, growing up in an antogonistic white neighborhood where we were the only Negro family on our street. That was in Atlanta, Georgia. In his kindergarten class there was one other Negro youngster, the son of a physician who lived less than a mile from us. Our presence in the neighborhood caused tensions that were felt by our children. My 16-year-old daughter was one of 20 Negroes attending the neighborhood high school five blocks from our home. The family's experiences give some clue to reasons why many Negroes are not interested in moving into better housing outside the ghetto. Generally, those who do move into white neighborhoods do so under the extreme pressure of needs for space and better housing in crowded Negro areas. And their moves are mainly just beyond the fringe of the Negro community, into areas that usually become an extension of the ghetto.

The mechanisms that operate to make and to keep communities segregated touch the lives of both whites and Negroes in areas where racial minorities are restricted. The day after we moved into our new Atlanta home, we found our bedroom window broken. Subsequently, shots were fired, cherry bombs and molotov cocktails were set off, and ominous looking black flambeaus were placed in our yard at night, the obvious intent of the perpetrator(s) being to light them. We were often pelted with eggs--on automobiles in our driveway and on windows--and trees on our lawn were favorite objects for toilet paper (called TP job).

Our son heard the family's discussion of these things and began to conceptualize differential racial treatment he had not known in St. Petersburg, Florida, where ours was a more friendly interracial setting. He began to ask the meaning of racial slurs and obscenities that were repeated nightly by screaming night riders. He saw his sister in tears after almost being run down by menacing teenage drivers while walking along the road coming from school. He heard her tell of being struck in school corridors by both girls and boys. And from some place he got the impression that "black" was a bad word when they used it to describe someone's face.

The impact of Negroes moving into a white neighborhood is not felt just by the minority group members. A white family whose house on our street had "for sale" signs of a Negro real estate firm found the dwelling vandalized. And other whites in the area were the constant targets of real estate agents trying to obtain "for sale" listings. The offending agents were both whites and Negroes.

Having had the problem of finding suitable housing for my family, and having had both positive and negative experience in racially integrated housing, I developed an interest in urban housing problems and was anxious to study the housing pattern of Atlanta.

PURPOSE

The main purpose of this research is to determine the means through which the system of racial segregation is established and maintained in Atlanta housing. Empirical evidence that the city's housing is, in fact, segregated may be found in the data of the United States Census of Population and Housing.* And the existence of housing segregation is a well known fact in most of the nation; consequently, the lengthy gymnastics of documenting the existence of segregation and devising indexes for measuring it won't be needed here. What I propose to do is to examine maps and census data to see the pattern Atlanta's segregated housing takes, to investigate the process of change that may be taking place there, and to study and isolate some of the mechanisms controlling, influencing or limiting change.

Indexes measuring racial separation in Atlanta housing show that Atlanta is 93.6 per cent segregated. I wish to know what keeps it so rigidly segregated. While this study is not focused primarily on the SES effects of housing segregation, the socio-economic, the cultural, the psychological and the educational deprivation that isolation causes are underlying problems that give added significance to this study. For this research they are the primary raison d'etre. My personal knowledge of some of the detrimental effects of housing problems guides the research and writing of this report.

A more general objective is broader than the specific: To bare the mechanisms through which housing segregation is established and maintained in the South. The data to be examined in this report are from Atlanta, but some projections may be made. Hopefully a series of investigations ultimately will be completed on the causes of existing housing patterns in a cross-section of southern cities.

Since Atlanta, the bell weather of the South, can boast of some racial cooperation in housing and can claim one of the nation's gilded Negro ghettos, generalizations made from the Atlanta study might provide useful slants or directions for observing and predicting patterns and mechanisms in the more progressive areas of the South. Whereas a variety of patterns might be found among various cities, it is expected that many of the mechanisms of control found in Atlanta, will be common to many of the other southern cities. But the more race conscious cities might show a more intense use of the common mechanisms for keeping racial housing segregated. In other words, bombs and violence may be used to slow housing desegregation in Atlanta, but a greater number of bombs, placed in a manner that might cause death, might be expected if attempts were made to desegregate housing in Birmingham, or Jackson, or some of the other cities of more intense racial antagonism.

IMPORTANCE OF THE PROBLEM

"The problem of the cities, in the form that it is now assuming, is the most urgent, the most difficult and the most frieghtening American domestic problem that has emerged in all the years of this country's history since the Civil War. Unless present trends are reversed, most of our great cities are due to become huge Negro reservations--a series of super-Watts. When and if that happens, 'black power' will no doubt be installed in City Hall."

Those words of syndicated columnist Joseph Alsop cogently state the significance of the problem under investigation. Continuing his August 1, 1966 column, the St. Petersburg Times, he writes:

"But when and if that happens...there will be other consequences, too. The change in the cities will not only accelerate white movement to the suburbs, until the city centers truly are reservations in the grimmest sense of that grim word. This change will also, and above all, accelerate another movement that has already begun without anyone paying much attention."

Alsop believes that finance and business, industry and commerce will follow the flight into the suburbs and that all the vast national investment in the centers will quite suddenly be almost worthless. More depressing, he visualizes city-sized super-Watts of the future as having hardly more resources of their own to solve their problems than the Watts District of Los Angeles has today. So he urged attention to the problem:

> "If we do not change the trend, there will be no hope of integration, no hope of equality for the Negro Americans. There will be an immense increase of the ugly race feeling that the riots have already begun to promote. There could even be, one day, a President Verwoerd in the White House. Any effort, any expenditure, any personal or national sacrifice, will be better than the thing we are threatened with, whites and Negroes together."

Alsop's statement does more than justify researching the problems, it justifies action programs. Even if racial problems are ignored, cities are becoming the nation's most pressing problem. If rigid racial segregation is joined with Negroes occupying expensive land in deteriorating core areas, urban troubles are greatly increased. Such settings provide contrasts between the haves and the have-nots. And poor housing is perpetuated, especially for Negroes who discover they can get credit to buy a $4,000 automobile but cannot get credit to buy a $5,000 home. Moreover, such settings further increase unnatural concentrations;* for example, 73 per cent of the nation's Negroes live in urban centers. About 35 years ago, 65 per cent lived in rural areas. Of the nation's 20 million Negroes, 52 per cent live in only 72 cities, and 75 per cent of them live in as few as 25 cities--Washington having the largest concentration and Atlanta having the 11th largest. Such concentrations harbor unemployment, cause transportation problems, generate communications static, and contribute to crime and delinquency.*

* See 1960 U.S. Census of Population, U. S. Summary, Detailed Characteristics, U. S. Department of Commerce; and Leo F. Schnore, The Urban Scene, for the 25 cities with largest Negro populations.

Further attesting to the significance of the urban housing problem and racial segregation in city housing are programs recently undertaken by governmental bodies. The Federal government has raised the Department of Housing and Urban Development to Cabinet level and given its work high priority. And on November 15, 1966, the city government of Atlanta sponsored a conference to discuss approaches and programs for eradication of minority group housing problems.

METHODOLOGY OF THIS REPORT

Participant observation accounts for no small part of the research for this report. Having lived from June, 1965 to June, 1966 isolated somewhat in a changing white neighborhood, I was an important statistic on the Atlanta housing scene. As the single Negro family on an otherwise all-white street in a fashionable Southwest Atlanta neighborhood, my family's first-hand experiences and their behavior under the stress of racial pressures offered hints and insights into what Negroes encounter in changing communities.

---

* This is no suggestion that cities are bad just because they are cities. However, uprooted people migrating to densely populated areas where there is social disintegration are, in fact, more proned to be victims of social degredation. See The Gang by Frederic M. Thrasher (University of Chicago Press, revised edition 1966) for a background discussion of this opinion.

Other sources of data are newspaper clippings, the research files of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., other published and unpublished documents, and interviews with key persons having special kinds of knowledge about Atlanta housing because of their employment, position, interest, or other factors. Data and impressions also were obtained from field trips, from interviews with and/or letters of financiers, real estate men, politicians, policemen and civil rights leaders, and from direct confrontations and conversations with both white and Negro residents of the city's few racially mixed neighborhoods.

HYPOTHESIS

The ~~tree~~-fold postulate that appears to be supported by available evidence is that (1) subordinate groups in societies with strong anti-minority group prejudices will tend to locate in housing that is in a coterminous area to other members of the subordinate group so as to permit interaction with in-group members; (2) that dysfunctions, limited space and socio-economic locational pressures will tend to force some families to migrate from restricted minority areas, but the migration will tend to be to destinations at the fringe or in close commuting distance to the area occupied by the subordinant group; and (3) stress against Negro migration to white areas will govern selection of who among the Negroes will migrate into unfriendly areas. Those migrating will tend to be those forced to move by poor housing conditions, and they generally will relocate in deteriorating former white housing. Conditioning factors will be access to convenient transportation that will permit them to maintain ties in the friendly area while they are establishing stability in the new area. Negroes with prior experience among whites will be, in most instances, better able to cope with the antagonism of the new locations.

The hypothesis is stated deliberately as if the subordinant racial or ethnic groups do have the choice of where they will locate. Some ethnic groups do. Negroes, for the most part, do not. Severe pressure from the superordinant group keeps most subordinants in their places, and the pressure helps determine who among the subordinant group are able to cope with the hardships of moving from the friendly environs into a sea of antagonism. Put more concretely, Negro ghettoes and such enclaves as "Little Italy" or "China Town" will attract and hold their residents because of a friendliness and tolerance to them, and because ventures outside the areas are made more intolerable by the hostile superordinant community. This will tend to be the case despite the other obvious advantages a new area might offer in locational economy, physical ammenities, municipal services, and over-all housing improvements. To consider properly the ecological forces impinging on the location of housing for minorities, then, one must take cognizance of both external (superordinant) and internal (subordinant) group controls, viz. the prejudices and pressures of the dominant group and the withdrawal of the minority group.

In this connection, Firey has pointed out how in Boston, Massachusetts, the paesari (people from the same village or origin) and the festas (anniversaries and other Old World celebrations) operate among Italian immigrants to keep them in the city's run-down North End.* He quotes a second generation Italian whom he asked if his immigrant parents ever contemplated leaving their North End tenement:

> "No, because all their friends are there, their relatives. They know everyone there."

In the case of Negroes clinging to slum areas in the South and other parts of the nation, conditions often are so bad that many residents would gladly move to new areas if open land and development capital or existing vacant housing were available for an extension of the ghetto or for an enclave. On the other hand, in the case of those who migrate to white areas, propelled by an adventurous spirit (or maybe a rebellious spirit) or by housing economics and need, sharp pulls and pressures may keep them torn between friends in the ghetto and the more desirable housing conditions outside.

Not the least of the problems may relate to schools. A Negro family in a predominantly white community may be isolated, not only in their home; their children, if not outright targets of prejudice, may be isolated in classrooms. And a charming

Negro girl who leaves a predominatly Negro high school where she is a candidate for school queen might have to reconcile herself to being ignored or scorned in her new integrated school setting. Or she may be met with other pressures--harrassment, violence, academic failure, and/or social ostracism. (The violence,* as the data shows, may range from fist fights to bombings. And the harrassment may range from telephone threats to the firing of parents from their jobs.)

As subsequent pages of this study will show, the major mechanisms for creating and maintaining housing segregation are external to the Negro community, but the external controls are supplemented by internal controls. And more than a few Negroes are unwilling to move into white areas; some say that they do not want to go where they are not wanted. In Atlanta and other cities, the land generally is controlled by whites, as we shall see below. Some Negroes who at first appear to be controllers of land and development capital are subsequently discovered to be fronts, representing white owners or backers.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF NEGRO RESIDENCE IN ATLANTA

Atlanta is fast becoming a predominatly Negro city, as did Washington, D. C., some years ago. Atlanta's leading politicians are fighting such a development, but they failed last summer in an attempt to pass a referendum for annexing Sandy Springs, a white suburban community. The annexation of suburban white communities would not automatically change the separateness of the two races in Atlanta, but it would bring about a better population balance between the races in the corporate city limits. The percentage of Negroes in the combined metropolitan area is holding steady at around 22 per cent, but the proportion of Negroes within the city has jumped from 38 per cent ot 43 per cent in the last five years.* Increase in the Negro proportion of the city population stems mainly from the movement of whites to bedroom communities outside the city limits.

The racial shift is even more pronounced when it comes to the school population. The major portion of white families moving to the suburbs are those with children. While the number of Negro children in Atlanta public schools was increasing 20,000 during the last five years, the overall number of white children was decreasing 2,000, according to Atlanta School Superintendent John Letson.

---

* The figures are computed from data of Atlant Metropolitan Region Planning Commission.

 The Atlanta Journal, March 15, 1966

This trend started about two decades ago when the Negro population began breaking out of a tight belt that cramped it into too little space in the central city. In the early years of expansion of the Negro community, the movement was mainly westward, the direction the city's political and financial determiners decreed. Negro and white real estate coalitions sometimes agreed on peripheral constructions such as cemeteries and public housing units which served as buffers to Negro expansion in undersired directions. Moreover, land planners and those responsible for the development of street patterns have used green areas, parks, railroads with the absence of under or overhead passes, and the absence of direct arterial access to sustain the pattern of racial separation in housing. It is hard to go from Negro areas to white areas. There is no circular pattern of travel and transportation.* Virtually all public transportation terminals in or near the heart of the city, and transfers from lines serving the Negro community to lines serving the white community generally requires a walk of several blocks. At about 8 a.m. on regualr work days, the downtown sidewalks are crowded with Negro domestic workers making their way to work in white homes, a trip that may take up to two or three hours each way, if the waiting periods are included.

The normal economic and commercial interest of the city would be served by an efficient circulation system. A good example of how the Atlanta road pattern defeats this goal is seen along the southern boundary of the Negro ghetto in the western part of the city. From the central area to the west city limits, a distance of about six miles, there are only three thorofares that provide fairly direct access between the Negro area at the Northwest and the white area at the Southwest. These are Ashby Street, Peyton Road, and Fairburn Road. All of the three except Peyton intersect with Cascade, a main artery in the Southwest.

It was clearly understood in the early '50's that Negroes were to have a corridor to the west for housing growth. The Butler Street Young Man's Christian Association and the Citizens Trust Company, both Negro institutions, planned and later built west side branches. Real estate interests developed fabulous Collier Heights and other subdivisions. But even in some agreed-upon growth directions, some of the affected whites took matters into their own hands and resisted Negro encroachment.* Explosives were planted near several newly purchased, fringe area homes as Negro migration threatened the Edgewood and Bankhead areas in the east and west parts of the city, the blasts coming frequently in the first half of the 1950's and then tapering off, only to increase again at the turn of the next decade.

Early movement of affluent Negroes to the west brought other action from nonviolent and more sophisticated whites. Though sometimes living on a common thoroughfare with Negroes, they tried to retain the prestige of not living on the same street with Negroes in some cases by changing the street's name in their area. Hunter Road, for example, became Mosley Drive at Chicamauga, and from Anderson Avenue westward it is called Gordon Road. As Negro expansion crept toward Ponce de Leon in the central northeast area a few years ago, the part of Boulevard beyond Ponce de Leon was renamed Monroe Drive and the extension of Parkway beyond the Negro residences was renamed Charles Allen Drive.

Movement of a Negro doctor into the Utoy-Peyton Forest area led to the erection of a barricade across Peyton Road to prevent direct ingress and egress of Negroes there and to deter further Negro housing expansion in that sector. This so-called Berlin Wall or Bamboo Curtain between the races was removed as a result of Negro political and legal pressures.[3]

Whites in the Peyton Forest area as in some other communities organized to resist Negro penetration and offered to buy the homes of those insistent on moving.

Before the federal courts struck down state and local laws and policies which excluded Negroes from public swimming pools and parks reserved for whites, the creeping expansion of the Negro community left the alternative of abandoning some formerly white parks and schools that became surrounded by Negro residents, or the choice of converting them for minority use. Georgia Avenue School on the southeast and Mosley Park on the west are good examples. Both were eventually turned over to Negroes.

During much of the last decade, government activity has increased both population and housing change. Public construction such as urban renewal and highways has displaced thousands of families, according to information from the Atlanta Journal gathered from various studies, reports, and proposed urban renewal and highway project projections. As reported by the Atlanta Journal on November 4, 1965, "Government activities have displaced 15,500 families during the past nine-and-one-half years, statistics show. From 9,000 to 12,000 of these families were in income brackets low enough to qualify for public housing. Yet during the same period, from January 1, 1956 to June 30, 1965, only slightly more than 4,000 new low-cost units of housing were made available. That leaves a housing deficit of 5,000 to 7,000 units for poorer Atlanta families." Enforcement of the city's minimum housing code displaced approximately 2,240 additional families, according to the Journal article.

Actually, the deficit is even higher. The figures do not reflect what is generally accepted as a significant population increase among poor Atlanta Negro families. The data was gathered from the 1958 relocation plan of the city of Atlanta, the city's workable Program, Atlanta's Urban Renewal Status Report of June 30, 1965, urban renewal project applications, and other sources.

In a large measure, those forced to relocate are on the lower economic rung, and that is indicative of the fact that greater economic problems are created for low income families.

Extremely hard pressed are those Negroes of small means, especially those who need, but are unable to qualify for, the inadequate supply of public housing.* Private Atlanta rentals run approximately 20 per cent higher than low-rent projects charge for comparable facilities. And developers have built few new homes in the city for prices less than $10,000. In a spot check of the cost of lots in the Negro community we find none selling for less than $3,000, even though some land we priced is of minimal sized lots. The high land cost tends to make construction of modest homes more expensive to buyers and less profitable to builders.

What has been said suggests that special attention is needed for the housing problems of the poor, especially poor Negroes where ghetto conditions create an artificial housing market. Among other things, subsequent pages of this paper will take a hard look at Atlanta's housing needs, the resources for supplying some needs by dissolution of the Negro ghetto, and the mechanisms--financial, political, attitudinal--that create and perpetuate the ghetto for minority group members. The urgency of a study of this type to guide policy decisions and action in this connection is signaled by the restiveness and violence of Watts in California and other erupting poverty pockets of the Northeast, Midwest, West and the South, including Atlanta.

* Some persons whose earnings are below the maximum prescribed for public housing tenants cannot qualify for admission for such reasons as these: No steady job, no husband in family, common law marriage, and most significant, no vacancy for large family in project applied for. Policy militates against placing a large family in an undersized apartment.

THE HOUSING PREDICAMENT OF ATLANTA'S NEGROES

Atlanta is the key metropolis in the Southeast, one of the 25 largest cities in this area with over one million persons residing in its five-county metropolitan area. Atlanta's industrial and commercial growth attracts thousands of low income newcomers annually, many of whom are Negroes who must seek shelter in deteriorating sections of the city. Their homes are the dilapidated and threadbare structures left behind by more affluent white citizens migrating to other neighborhoods and other communities.

Statistical evidence to support this conclusion is found in Table I. It reveals that the city is heavily Negro, and the surrounding suburban communities predominantly white. But it shows more than this: nearly 187,000 Negroes are competing feverishly for spcae in the segregated neighborhoods now open to them.

The situation is getting worse. While the 1960 U.S. Census fi figures and the April 1965 setimates of the Atlanta Region Metropolitan Planning Commission show a significant rise in the total population for the Atlanta area, they also show a slight decline in the number of white city residents and relatively large increases in Negro city residents (See Table 2 below).

Negro Housing Lag--Contrasting with the increased Negro share of the total city population is the lagging growth in the number of Negro housing units. Despite a drop in the percentage of whites in the total population, white housing units increased significantly (see Table 3 below). This suggests a continuing shift of families with children to suburbia and a counter movement of childless couples and single persons into high rise apartments in the central city. At least one of these high rise apartments[4] in the upper-middle income brackets was built on land from which deteriorating Negro housing was removed in urban renewal projects, and some of the cleared land was converted to industrial use.

The pinch that this trend of slum removal and the concommittant restrictions against open occupancy are making on Negroes is accentuated by a variety of programs considered progressive when properly administered--highway construction, condemnations to make way for public buildings, etc.

Negro Overcrowding--Evidence that highway construction and urba renewal are among factors influencing crowding of low income Negroes is reported in the 1963 annual report of the Fulton County Departmen of Family and Children Services. Entitled, Applachia in Atlanta the report states that bulldozing for renewal and highways has indeed cleared away some slums, but a result has been the pushing of many slum dwellers back to the fringes of the areas cleared, making their overcrowded conditions even more crowded.

This is not reflected in the overall tract figures of census data, for the units are too large. And no block-by-block analysis was undertaken. Nevertheless, field trips to hard-core poverty pockets suggest increasing density of some of the poorest families; for example, the welfare department's report discloses that, "...for five years prior to 1960, 102 welfare recipients lived in Merritts Avenue, N.E. (adjacent to an urban renewal area), while during the last five years, 192 welfare recipients have lived on the same street." * That latter figure represents about a 90 per cent increase in the density of Merritts Avenue welfare recipients.

Inspection of working maps reveals that the Negro population, which represents 43 per cent of the city of Atlanta's total, occupies only about 15 to 20 per cent of the city's land area. These figures imply dense ghetto living for Negroes, especially in low income districts; but they are somewhat relieved by the rapid pace of housing construction for both whites and Negroes. For those who can afford better housing, the situation seems to be improving. (see Table 3)

Housing Conditions--While the over-all quantity of Negro housing units is inadequate and the Negro's proportional share of land use falls far below Negro population percentages, a more important problem is the condition of the housing in the Negro ghetto.[5] A study now in progress by the city indicates that when data relating to condition of housing are introduced, Negro housing balance is far out of proportion.[6]

*See Appalachia Atlanta, the 1963 annual report of Fulton County Department of Family and Children Services (pamphlet).

In 1960 U.S. Census reports 46 of each 100 Negro homes surveyed were deteriorating, dilapidated, or lacked amenities. When applied to the total of Atlanta Negro housing, this suggests that 28,235 Negr houses are substandard in one degree or another.

According to Appalachia in Atlanta "the physical condition of the shelter occupied by 54 per cent of welfare recipients is classified as ranging from fair to very poor; 76.84 per cent of them are living in unsanitary conditions, and 55.08 per cent are residing in housing needing renovation or repairs."* (Plunketown, near the city's south corporate limits, is a pocket of Negro housing with outside privies and slum dwellings.)

Moreover, since much of the Negro housing migration tends to be into lowincome white fringe areas, old, formerly white houses newly purchased by Negroes are likely to deteriorate rapidly. This is especially true of borderline homes like those Negroes are buying in Atlanta's West End and Kirkwood areas and, more recently, the Center Hill area.

High Cost of Negro Housing--Not only is the Negro disadvantaged from the standpoint of availability oand quality of housing, he must pay premium prices for the inadequate facilities available to him. These prices are rising, Between 1950 and 1960, median rentals to Negro families in the Atlanta area more than doubled their cost, rising from $23.72 to $52.00. Most Negro families pay from $40.00 to $59.00 a month in rent (See Table 4).

In absolute terms, cost of housing does not seem to be high for the Negro in the Atlanta area, but when the costs are related to his meager income they are seen to constitute a heavy drain. Average income for all families in Atlanta in 1959 was $5,758, but the average non-white family income was only $3,033. Although non-white family income is about half the average for all families, the non-white family pays only $15.00 less than the average rent, $67.00 , paid by all families. In other words, on a proportional basis, the non-white family pays substantially more rent than does the white Atlantan. (See Table 5).

Costs of building or buying homes in Negro areas also appear to be markedly higher than costs of equivalent accommodations in some white communities. For example, housing experts interviewed estimated that "other things being equal," a $20,000 house in the all-Negro Collier Heights district would cost an estimated $2,000 less in Chamblee, a white suburban area. *

* Obviously this is due to the greater demand for land in Negro areas where a proportionally smaller amount of land is available for a larger number of potential buyers, many of whom are restricted from land outside the Negro ghetto. Owners of land in the Negro areas include whites and Negroes, but few Negroes own land in the white areas.

Conclusions--Neither the corporate city of Atlanta nor any governmental unit of the metropolitan area has laws prohibiting racial discrimination in housing. Consequently, many of the Negroes displaced by slum clearance and/or other public projects such as highway construction and schools face heavy burdens in their search for standard housing. Many with very low income end up more poorly housed and cramped by overcrowding after displacement This is due largely to the building of proportionately fewer homes for low-income families and partly to the limited availability of homes for large families, especially those needing three or more bedrooms. For large poor families, the city's oldest supply of houses offers best prospects for obtaining enough room, and this is likely to be deteriorating rapidly.

In sum, the predicament of the Negro resident of Atlanta is that of rapidly expanding population pressing on limited and inadequate housing resources. Its consequence is crowding, high costs, and personal and social disturbance and dislocation. There has been no effective effort to relieve this situation by public or private interests. Migration into contiquous previously white neighborhoods and a limited movement of wealthier Negroes into formerly segregated suburbs has taken place, but these shifts serve to merely to highlight the basic problem--large numbers of Negro residents who remain compacted in dreary and relatively costly quarters--a blemish on the city and a threat to the community.

RESOURCES FOR HOUSING RELOCATION

The preceding section of this report confirms the assumption that a sizeable segment of Atlanta's Negro population has grave housing needs that are not presently being satisfied. Ironically, these needs exist in a dynamic, fast growing city where housing resources outside the ghetto areas are substantial. These resources include: a good supply of vacant homes of standard quality; and, adequate basic community services (schools, libraries, health, fir and police protection) adjacent to this housing.

As mentioned above, Negroes are moving into some of these areas. This migration is increasing in volume, and destinations are becoming more varied. Table 6 catalogues this trend.

Vacant Houses and Economics -- Scattered throughout the city are some 9,040 vacant houses, a sum computed from the figures of Atlanta Region Metropolitan Planning Commission. In addition, 11,732 units are available outside the city limits but within the metropolitan area, for a total of 20,772 vacant units.[8]

Newspaper reports published during the summer of 1966 indicated that approximately 300 of the vacant units are in public low-income projects.[9] These projects are=desegrating slowly; 16 to 20 Negro families live among whites in these projects. The projects have long waiting lists, yet some poverty-striken Negroes cannot qualify for admission because they have no steady employment, cannot prove marriage, or for some other reason. All eleven of Atlanta's public housing projects are situated wither within or adjacent to predominantly Negro communities. To some degree, they serve as buffers to expansion of the ghetto at some fringes of Negro sections. There is no way short of actually surveying the various costs of vacant residences and earnings of potential Negro occupants to determine whether ill-housed Negroes could afford the vacant dwellings which are found in every census tract in the city.[10] But, obviously, many could. Karl Taeuber says there would be amply supply of economical housing for low income Negroes if race were not a barrier. Giving added weight to this assumption is the evidence above that Negroes tend to pay more than whites for comparable housing because of the artificial market created by ghetto barriers.

Support of the findings of this report is found in a recent Labor Department study: Writing in the October, 1966, issue of the monthly Labor Review, Phyllis Groom of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, reported that in Atlanta and the five other cities included in the study families with incomes of less than $3,000 a year got less for their rent dollars "considering conditions of the housing, heating and plumbing facilities, number of rooms and the quality of the neighborhood."* Surveys for the Labor Department study were conducted in Atlanta, Chicago, Houston, and Los Angeles.

In addition to the above, there is evidence that some Negroes must decline offers of jobs in outlying areas because they either are unable to solve problems of transportation to and from the job or they are not free to move nearer the place of potential employment.[11] This highlights another of the complexities that relate housing to socio-economics. Even the federal government, like some other so-called "Equal Opportunity Employers," unwittingly builds bias against potential Negro employees by locating plants far from the areas where most Negroes live. The reverse is true of certain kinds of economic activity; for example, warehouses which are frequently found along railroad tracks in the Negro section.

Conclusions -- Atlanta has some political awareness of its urban housing problems and has commissioned studies to develop criteria for a workable program for community improvement. Moreover, there are volunteer groups and non-profit agencies which are well suited and have expressed interest in helping to solve problems. Most important of all, surplus housing is available in significant quantity throughout the city.

* For further discussion on this point see Phyllis Groom's report, Labor Review, October, 1966.

Despite the availability of vacancies in dispersed areas, the bulk of Negro migration is to deteriorating housing at the fringes of Negro areas. Change thus represents extension of the Negro ghetto or the creation of new Negro enclaves.

If the hypothesis that there must be a dissolution of the ghetto if the causes of socio-economic and housing problems are to be removed is valid, it follows that a bold program of corrective action may be needed to break housing barriers, and that the entire metropolitan area must be included in such a program. But before embarking on any remedial programs, policymakers and activists must have some understanding of the mechanics which keep Atlanta segregated, if they want the remedial programs to be effective. What part does violence play? Are Negroes afraid to move out of the ghetto? If so, why? For these and other questions, answers are needed.

BOMBS, VIOLENCE AND INTIMIDATION

Three fire bombs tossed into the home of a Negro family narrowly missed burning to death four small children who were rescued by their father. The exploding fire bomb was thrown through the bedroom window of the unsuspecting youngsters after their family moved into a previously all-white Atlanta neighborhood. (See Table 7 below)

That was just one of a rash of bombings that shook Atlanta as recently as five years ago. There have been more recent racially inspired bombings, but Atlanta generally has become more sophisticated in its controls and sanctions for segregated housing. Except in a few instances, Negroes now moving into racial "twilight zones" (that is what the white president of a large lending institution called a transition area when forced to talk about it with a builder in my presence) suffer less violent harrassment. Some suffer none. But some form of intimidation, along with white control of land, capital and municipal services, continue as leading determiners of where Negroes live in Atlanta.

The city's mayor is a racial moderate, and so is the chief of police. But Atlanta also has its Ku Klux Klan element. Chief Herbert Jenkins said he believes the backlog of information his department has on Klan members is an effective weapon against bombings. And leaders in politics, business and finance have opposed dynamiting in an effort to keep Atlanta from gaining the negative reputation of Birmingham, Alabama, sometimes called "Bombing-ham" by civil rights advocates because of the Alabama city's bloody record in the use of explosives against Negroes and Negro housing.

I was introduced to Atlanta's bombings more than a decade ago while working there as a newspaper reporter. I met the problem again in 1965 when small but noisy explosives were set off in front of my home in a white area shortly after my family moved back into the city after being absent for eight years. Approximately 30 Negro homes have been targets of Atlanta bombers[12] since 1956, with nearly two-thirds of that number coming in the first half of the decade.

"NON-VIOLENT" HARRASSMENT AND INTIMIDATION

Violent bombings represent only part of the intimidation and harrassment meted out to Negro families who jump racial housing barriers. Cross-burnings, telephone threats, and a variety of other techniques are used to keep housing boundaries intact. These negative acts against minority migrants increase in spurts as attempts increase to break out of the ghetto. Table 8 lists some of the cross burnings and Table 9 shows a sample of other acts designed to slow Negro migration.

Do the explosions and harrassment serve their purpose of blocking Negro penetration into white housing areas? The answer has to be qualified. They do not stop migration altogether, but do serve as a strong deterrent and delaying tactic. No one is anxious to suject his family to post-midnight blasts. But movement from the ghetto to the fringe area or to enclaves in white areas continue on a limited basis, often coming in spurts when whites make minor retreats. On the other hand, pressures may continue to be so great that some migrating Negro families may elect to sell newly-purchased homes back to whites, who often are able to raise a "kitty" from among those committed to segregation. Examples of the above are found in the Atlanta data.

LAWFUL MECHANISMS CONTROLLING NEGRO MIGRATION

Informal mechanisms such as were discussed in the preceding sections of this report are backed up by formal action of governmental agencies and courts and other institutions to keep Negroes living in their traditional districts. A Negro real estate man, for example, may find himself hauled into court or before a licensing commission for selling or buying a house outside the Negro ghetto, or a Negro homeowner may have to give up a house in a white area to avoid being jailed on some other charge.

Atlanta Negro L. C. Owens must have been dubious about his much propagandized "freedom to own property" after he bought a house at 31 Montgomery Street, Atlanta, from a white owner in 1960. He was arrested on a disorderly conduct-moving at night charge along with truck driver Frank Price, who was helping Owens to move into the white area. Municipal Judge J.E. Webb dismissed the charges after Owens agreed to seel the house back to the former owner, Harry Maico, white. The ban on night moving obviously was designed to keep Negroes from slipping unnoticed into some newly-purchased house in white areas under the cover of darkness. The ordinance appears to have had some selective enforcement with Negro block busters as main targets.

Perhaps the most widely publicised governmental act designed to keep Atlanta Negroes in their separate neighborhoods was the erection of a barricade, and closure of a street between a densely settled Negro community on one side and open land and housing for whites on the other. This effort to keep Negroes out of the Utoy-Peyton Forest, Cascade Heights and surrounding communities in southwest Atlanta already has been metioned in an earlier section of this report. Called everything from Berlin Wall to Warsaw Ghetto, the barricade was struck down by a court order and Negroes began to spill over into the once protected area. Atlanta's racially moderate mayor, Ivan Allen, who earlier had agreed to the barricade' erection, later acceded to the court edict and began to mend his fences among the Negro electorate that helped elect him, but not before revealing that his predecessor, former Mayor William B. Hartsfield, also a racial moderate, in prior years had closed streets to prevent the spread of the Negro ghetto. Hartsfield admitted that he had achieved that goal by various ways, including street closures, but streets were not closed by ordinance as done under Allen's administration. Rather, aldermanic board resolutions were used to effect the closures. Hartsfield argued that he had made many mistakes while serving as mayor, but that he never made one that could be photographed.

The barricade ordinance lasted only a short time. It went on the books in late 1962 and was ruled illegal in early 1963. A more pervasive bill in January 1965 never became law. Georgia State Senator Culver Kidd of Milledgeville introduced an amendment to the state constitution similar to the widely publicised California amendment to prevent housing integration. The Kidd amendment would have been most keenly felt by Negroes in Atlanta where they possess the money and political power to force their way into some white communities.

As the power of Negroes continues to increase, some of the old corporate methods of containing them in the ghetto are beginning to fail. An example of this was the failure three years ago of an effort to build a Negro cemetary at the west end of West View cemetery for whites to block Negro entrance to Peyton Forest. West View cemetery had for years been used as a buffer zone to discourage Negroes from moving into West End, a fairly low grade deteriorating community.

One Negro real estate man who was among respondents discussing the use of public housing projects as buffers between Negro and white areas said, "The low-rent public housing at the edge of West End is the longest strip of public projects in the country, I believe; it is narrow and long, unlike the projects in most places, where they are on wide tracts of land so they may have proper play and parking areas." In arguing successfully against the 1963 plan that would have added a second cemetery to the West Side buffer strip, Negro leaders insisted that they would not cooperate with a plan to permit their dead to lie in an area where the living Negro could not reside.

LAND CONTROL

Who controls the land in the city of Atlanta? A general answer gleaned from Negro and white respondents places land control mainly in the hands of white financial institutions, white developers and real estate interests.* But Negroes do have some. Their growing purse makes them an important consideration, explained the president of the largest financial institution making loans for Atlanta Negro homes.

Asked if problems are encountered in acquiring land for minority use, an official of Empire Real Estate Board, a Negro professional organization, qualified his reply, answering,"Yes and No." Despite white control of almost all the land outside the ghetto, there is some open land for new Negro housing within the northwest Negro district. "Some years ago they (white land owners) wouldn't sell tracts way out to Negroes, but now there is less prohibitiveness," said the real estate official, adding, "99 per cent of Atlanta's Negro housing is built by white developers, but Negro brokers and salesmen usually are involved as agents."

Some 20-odd years ago Atlanta Negroes were tightly cramped. The westside ghetto was bounded by Simpson Street on the north near the only Negro golf course, Lincoln Country Club. Agreement to open for them a corridor to the west was hammered out in a meeting of the Negro real estate board and the housing committee of the Chamber of Commerce.

The agreement did not automatically resolve the Negro land problem. A white financial institution built frame houses for white veterans, blocking westward expansion of the Negro community. But Negroes eventually became "second owners" of these houses and gained access to more land farther west. Crestwood and some other subdivisions which became Negro areas initially had been plaited for whites but never developed for them.

There has since been the construction of a thousand 221-D-3 housing units for Negroes in Carol Heights,"but that land too was controlled by whites" who cooperated to make it available to Negroes, according to respondents.

* This question was asked the real estate brokers, developers and savings and loan officials during open-ended interviews.

"We (Negroes) have been lucky," said a Negro real estate broker, "the finance institutions have been more liberal here than in other cities... It takes a lot of money to develop dead land. You need a backlog of capital."

In contested areas a Negro may gain access to the land and still have trouble developing it. And lack of capital is not always the drawback. Government obstacles and negative community reactions may be responsible. A wealthy Negro physician, for example, purchased land at the fringe of Peyton Forest but was unable to develop it. He sold the land to a white developer specializing in the construction of homes for Negroes and the land was soon improved. In another case, a Negro real estate broker acquired close to a dozen lots farther out in the Peyton area. He has been unable to obtain easement to run sewers through adjacent white-owned property so the land goes unimproved.

Zoning practices also may be a factor working against change of existing Negro housing patterns. However, special land use permits sometimes serve to speed some changes. For example, they may operate to speed the cycle of a community already changing from white to Negro. It is not unusual for land owners to seek permits to intensify land use in a community once a few Negroes move in. The erection of multi-units and the changing of the character of the area by addition of light business and commercial building help speed the remaining whites on to suburban or other areas not threatened by change. Cooperation of whites and Negroes in the newly-integrated West Manor community recently caused the failure of an attempt to rezone land for more intense use in a transitional area. The land owners sought to change the zoning from single family residences so that an apartment building could be constructed. A white woman of the area who spoke at the July hearing said, "I don't want these apartments in; I want our neighborhood to be as nice as possible because I don't want to move out. I have a Negro family next door to me, but I will not move."

Whether there is differential enforcement of building code inspections between white and Negro developers is not easily documented. Whites do most of the developing in both Negro and white areas. Although no inspection bias was reported, one respondent pointed out that the city has no Negro building inspectors, and another voiced a suspicion that white developers of Negro housing might be permitted certain short cuts or borderline violations more frequently than Negro builders.

REMOVAL VERSUS RELOCATION

Slum clearance in the central part of northeast Atlanta generally has meant Negro removal. Federally financed urban renewal programs have made way for many desirable developments such as a new sprawling municipal auditorium in the process of being built in the northeast, and a multi-million dollar baseball stadium in a southeast Negro slum area. Urban renewal permits local options and controls that allow local institutions to build-in the mechanisms that maintain racial separation as the dominant pattern of Atlanta housing. So do the programs of Atlanta Housing Authority. One Negro has been appointed to the Atlanta Housing Authority, which has charge of low-rent public housing, but his presence has not changed the pattern of desegregation in public housing from mere tokenism.* For the two races the housing authority has separate Negro and white listings, and separate offices. In September only about 20 Negroes were being housed among whites in predominantly white housing projects, according to newspaper reports.

*The politicians and institutions currently in power generally are given the prerogatives for appointing those who will administer and make various policies related to housing, and "token" Negro leaders -- those acceptable to whites but not necessarily representative of the Negro population -- are likely to be named to some policy boards. A person appointed but who fails to follow the general thinking of the appointing powers may find himself replaced or not reappointed.

Similarly, urban renewal relocation programs have placed few, if any, Negroes among whites. Even when all urban renewal relocations are considered, the rate is proportionately low compared to the vast numbers of families forced to move because of slum clearance. In some cases, reported the Atlanta Constitution, the programs have removed 500 or more persons from a one block alley. With regular residential lots of 100 to 200 feet wide, it would take more than six blocks to re-house them. Moreover, newer subdivisions with lots of that size are not likely to have small houses that will fit the pockets of former slum dwellers of modest means. Atlanta, in other words, has short supply of homes of standard quality for lower economic classes. To ease this problem all over the nation, "Comsat Corporation for Housing" was proposed in late 1966 by the U. S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to build five million low cost units at a cost of $50 billion.

THE ROLE OF PRIVATE FINANCE

As already stated, it takes a good deal of capital "to develop dead land," more than Atlanta Negroes are able to muster independently of whites. White financial institutions, consequently, are depended upon by Negro real estate men and builders for making loans to their clients. This role causes white capital to play a heavy hand in determining where Negroes live. An arbitrary limit was placed on the amount that would be lent to a Negro, said a Negro attorney who moved to Atlanta in the early 1960's and sought money to build a sprawling $40,000 home. The lawyer, now a high government official, said the limit was $20,000.00. But the head of a lending institution said limits are based on considerations of both the borrowing individual and the location of the house he wants to build. In other words, bankers will not lend as much to build a house adjacent to a railroad track or next to a fertilizer plant.

When compared with other cities of the South, Atlanta has considerable Negro capital. But white-owned Atlanta Federal Savings and Loan Association is a leader in the Negro home loan market. Among the Negro finance institutions are Citizens Trust Co., a commercial bank with a home office and branch office; Mutual Federal Savings & Loan Association, a competitor for home loans, and an Auburn Avenue mortgage purchasing firm which buys at discount a proportionately small amount of second mortgages. Other more substantial Negro money is concentrated in Atlanta Life and North Carolina Mutual Life insurance companies. The Atlanta Life on occasion has authorized Citizen's Trust Co., as its agent, to lend large sums for Negro housing when white institutions were freezing credit to deter migration into disputed areas. Such practices have been instrumental in changing the lending practices of the white institutions, for after the first few Negroes move into a new area, white lenders reenter the market.

Traditionally, financing of houses for Negroes initially has proven difficult in areas where Negroes were not wanted. A representative of Empire Real Estate Board explained that when attempts are first made for a Negro to buy into a white community, a committee from the white area might call on the presidents of banks or savings and loan associations to request denial of loans to Negroes in the threatened area. Several other respondents said this kind of community pressure has been brought to bear on Atlanta lenders. But relationships between the white lender and Negro borrower remain good and business is resumed after crises subside.

In the final analysis, money talks, and both the heads of white lending institutions and Negro real estate interests agree on that. The case of a Negro physician trying to buy the first property to be sold to a non-white in Peyton Forest demonstrates how the system works. What he needed for mortgage money was committed to him by the Atlanta Life, but the Negro firm was discouraged from doing so by key whites who said the purchase might cause a deterioration of the city's good race relations. "They had frozen the credit of everybody...The closing was set three different times before the purchase went through," recalled a Negro real estate man. But the Negro did buy and move into the disputed area.

Resisting the Negro invasion, the Southwest Citizens Association, organized in 1962 to hold the line, got together a war chest and bought some $200,000 worth of property from neighborhood whites who because of job transfers, or other reasons, wanted to sell and threatened to place their houses on the Negro market. The association, however, could not match the combined resources of the Negro insurance companies, banks and real estate firms. One delighted white owner in the area was able to bid up his property between the two groups from $65,000 to $105,000.

Although there was obvious cooperation and pooling to break the Utoy-Peyton barriers, Atlanta's Negro financiers are hardnosed, and perhaps more careful and selective of clients than some of the white institutions. Negro real estate is big business with probably a hundred Negro agents and brokers in Atlanta. But they must operate in cooperation and subordination to white capital and political power, else they perish. The loss of license is a continual threat to the Negro real estate man who gets too far out of line.

Big finance makes big decisions, not the least of which may be decisions on where Negroes may live in the city. And because the financial leadership is concentrated in the hands of a few elites, those big decisions may often be made on the "back-nine" at a golf and country club, or over a cocktail at noon.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

Life for Negroes in housing outside the ghetto often falls far short of the American dream because multi-racial neighborhoods may not be fully accepted. Indeed, some Negroes as demonstrated by this report, may become objects of violence and antagonism. Consequently, it is not surprising that more than a few Negroes are not pushing for housing in lily white neighborhoods. This is true, despite the relative advantages offered by most white communities in such things as better municipal services, better schools, and improved housing. But the long run advantages of dissolution of the ghetto have been well stated by many writers on the subject. In the foregoing pages, I have sought to isolate some of the mechanisms controlling, influencing or limiting the housing desegregation that many cite as an end of the American dream.

In Atlanta, where 93.6 per cent of the Negroes would have to be relocated in order to have them proportionally distributed throughout the city, strong deterrents to racial desegregation in housing have been bombings, cross burnings, and various other harrassment and intimidation. Meanwhile, the city has become 43 per cent Negro. On one hand, Negroes are migrating in the core area to housing that is deteriorating. Whites, on the other hand, are moving in increasing numbers to the suburbs where the housing is new. Bulldozing has increased the concentration of the rock-bottom poor, including welfare recipients, despite a sharp decrease in slum acreage. And some former slum land has been converted to commercial, and other uses that do not directly benefit the former occupants. Less land and housing are available for low income Negroes. The data on vacancies, which add up to about 5 per cent, suggests that there may be existing housing for relocating many of those concentrated in slum areas, but racial prejudice militates against this.

Among mechanisms perpetuating the racial pattern in Atlanta are: control of the land by whites, economics in all. - their domination of housing development for Negroes, corporate barriers to building Negro housing outside the proscribed ghetto, differential zoning, biased application of land clearance and condemnation, and white control of the finance and capital needed for new housing development.

Also operating to maintain Atlanta's pattern of almost total separation of Negro and white housing has been the city's transportation and communication pattern. Access roads between Negro and white areas are limited and not direct. Making moves between the sections require extra time and expense, thereby deterring migration. (The fact that only two roads run between Gordon Road and Cascade on the city's west side is good evidence of this.)

The findings give added credence to the assumption that some Negroes are not anxious to live among whites and that they prefer the friendliness of the Negro ghetto. But their migration to deteriorating housing in areas that quickly become an extension of the Negro ghetto obviously is not solving the problems, for their tap root is segregation, the very thing that is being extended. The Negroes best suited for coping with the antagonism and violence directed at them in white areas are those who are not directly dependent upon whites for economical survival. All of this suggests the need for bold action programs if the circular pattern of housing segregation is to be broken. Programs directed toward the solution of housing problems will be the focus of further study and a final section of this report.

Welfare

NEGROES IN SOCIAL WORK IN THE SOUTH 1936-1949

Released July 1951

One of the valuable by-products of expanded public welfare services in the South in recent years is the increased employment of Negro social workers.

There are now a total of 186 Negro social workers employed by agencies in eleven Southern states, according to a survey released by the North Carolina Board of Public Welfare several months ago. Most of these--177, to be exact--are in public welfare work, with ~~only a~~ the remaining few in private agencies or in ~~other~~ publicly-supported social work jobs outside the welfare field. Six other professionally trained Negro social workers are now working in non-social work jobs.

The study, conducted by John Larkins, consultant on Negro work for the North Carolina Board, also indicated that Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia employ more Negro social workers than other states. Mr. Larkins points out, however, that other sources indicate ~~that~~ that Georgia actually employs the largest number of Negro social workers. Mr. Larkins' figures, based on 396 questionnaires completed by social workers and administrators throughout the region, show the following number of Negro workers employed in each state:

State	No. workers
Alabama	5
Arkansas	3
Florida	17
Georgia	13
Kentucky	12
Louisiana	45
Mississippi	2
North Carolina	34
South Carolina	7
Tennessee	15
Virginia	35
Other states	7
Total	192

Some mention is made of the distribution of Negro social workers within each state. Negro social workers, like social workers in general, tend to concentrate in urban areas. Louisiana presents an extreme example of this concentration. Forty-four of the 45 workers are found in Orleans Parish, ~~with~~

The 34 Negro social workers in North Carolina, on the other hand, were scattered out in 16 counties. North Carolina, indidentally, had the largest number of workers employed in counties that are predominately rural.

To date, the type of jobs open to Negro social workers are limited, with opportunities for advancement beyond the case work level even more limited. Only 3% of the present workers, in fact, have attained supervisory or administrative positions. Three superintendents were found in Orleans Parish, La. and one in Norfolk, Va. City Department of Public Welfare. The Child Care Bureau of Virginia State Department of Welfare and Institutions also has a Negro supervisor and the North Carolina State Board of Public Welfare employs one administrator.

As the table below indicates, the great bulk of social workers are found at the case work level:

Type of job	No workers
Case work trainee	2
Case work assistant	5
Case worker	132
Child welfare	34
Probation counselor	4
Supervisor	5
Administration	2
Group work	1
Other	1

The majority of the workers covered in Mr. Larkins' study were in the $161-$240 per month salary range. Roughtly 3% fell below this range, receiving $141-$160 per month, and about 9% advanced to a higher range. Only 2% are paid more than $300 per month and none in this bracket worked in state, county or city welfare departments. The average (median) monthly salarly for all workers was $197.72 per month.

Considering training, experience and job tenure, salaries were not overly generous. An examination of the educational achievements showed that 18% held master's degrees and an additional 37% had bachelor's degrees plus some graduate work or other specialized social work training. ~~Just~~ 14% of the workers had not earned college degrees of any type. Over 20% had been employed in various social work jobs for ten years or more, and Mr. Larkins found a relatively low rate of job mobility.

Employment of Negro social workers has steadily increased ~~sixxxxxxx~~ with the general expansion of public welfare services in the South since 1935. New Deal measures, particularly the Social Security Act of 1935, provded both funds and impetus for broader publiclly financed social services, and more comprehensive assistance has called for more welfare depts with larger staffs.* ~~xxxxxxxxx~~ ~~xxxxxxxx xx xxxxxxxx~~ ~~xxxxxxx~~ It is true that Negroes were used at all levels frequently and during the emergency relief period of the early 1930's and that Negroes were the first to feel the impact when the scoial security legislation of 1935 brought about increased participation by state and local government.

add: Negro social workers worked in other parts of country before depression mostly in part organizations rather than part

Shortage of trained workers, plus the fact that Negroes ~~xxxx~~ numbered greatly among the recipients of public assistance, led to the practice ~~xxx~~ of hiring Negro ~~xxxxx~~ welfare workers.

~~Conferences and correspondence with administrators ind.~~

For the most part administrators and supervisors who have ~~xxxxxxx~~ employed Negro social workers have found them satisfactory. It is generally accepted, ~~Mr. Larkin found, xxxx~~ where Negroes have been employed, Mr. Larkins found, that they had a better understanding of the problems of their group and were able to do more with them. The comment of a case work supervisor in a large county dept of publi welfare is typical, "They are good in the social work field as they have so much interest in the welfare of their people."

Reports also suggest that ~~departments employing Negro social workers~~ working relationships between Negro and white staff members have more often than not been good and that Negro workers contributed to effective community relationships. One administrator, whose department had employed Negro workers for 10 years noted that "There ~~xxxxxx~~ exists a wonderful relationship. There has been no friction." ~~xxx~~ "small no of Another described a stiuation ~~recently~~ occurring in his agency that ~~The following report from an administrator~~ illustrates ~~successful~~ ~~successful~~ staff integration ~~in one welfare agency. "Negro social workers are well accepted by our entire staff for their ability and performance on the job.~~

"A vanancy now exists as supervisor of the Child Welfare Department. Our case workers were called for a conference and told that they would take turns serving as 'leader' for a month each until such time as a supervisor was appointed. the group of white case workers immediately suggested the appointment of a Negro workers as the first 'leader' because she has the best training and background of experience. She is now supervising both white and Negro child welfare workers on a temporary basis and doing an exceptional job." ~~Negro social workers are employed in relation to the percentage of Negro case load in the agency.~~"

Supervisors who had had unsatisfactory experience with Negro social workers seemed to mention personality, insufficient training and community relations most often as resons the workers were not successful in their jobs. One county director felt that"Most of the difficulties which arise in connection with Negro workers would be overcome by the employment of trained Negro workers." Training and adherance to professional standards are always important , but as Mr. Larkins points out, if the Negro worker brought into ax program as a "pioneer" is unable to create a satisfactory working relationship with the administraors, clients, Negro leadership and community in general, the possibility of continuing his employment or of addming more Negro workers is very slight.

A few supervisors felt that Negro social workers whom they had not found satisfactory were "too race-conscious" or not objective in their relationship with their clients. One noted that the unsatisfactory worker's clients requested to be reassigned to white workers on many occasions and seemed to believe--as ~~many~~ other supervisors still do--that the Negro clients lacked confidence in a worker of their own race.

Despite satisfactory service, administrators who were currently employing or had employed Negro social workers felt that the future possibilities of increasing the number of Negro workers did not seem encouraging. Chi f among the reasons they gave were: inadequate funds; limited case load of Negro clients not justifying an increase; community attitudes and reactions not receptive to the idea; and physical facilities not conducive to increase.

Some attempt was made to ascertain why workers had not been employed in areas where Negroes constitute a large per cent of the recipients of financial assistance, and other welfare services. Responses were as follows:

(1) Physical facil ties, i.e., office space, location of department, were not conducive to the employment of a Negro social worker 21%

(2) Community reactions, relations, and general attitudes would not be conducive to the employment of a Negro social worker 18%

(3) Geographic distribution of clients would make the employment of a Negro social worker too expensive 13%

(4) Appropriaions for administraion would not permit the employment of a Negro social worker.....8

(5) Preference for white social workers indica ed by Negro clients.....8

(6) No budgeted position that could have been filled by a Negro worker...7%

(7) A Negro social worker desired but had not been availalbe.....6%

~~Response from one director indicated that employment of Negroes as home demonstration agents and in supervisory positions in education in his county mde him feel that there would not be unfavorable reaction if a Negro were employed in the welfare department~~

Several responses illustrate the manner in which ~~The~~ community reaction to the employment of Negro workers ~~is of course geared to the degree that the community~~ is rela ed to community acceptance of public welfare services. For example, one administr tor stated, "As superintendent of public welfare, I k ow that we should have a Negro worker on our sa ff; however, I also know that in view of community attitu es regarding the public welfare program and in view of the racial relationships, that it would be detrimental to the program and most hard for ~~the~~ a worker if one ware employed. In looking tinto the future, we thing that unless there is a continued monting friction between the races that within the next few years there are possibil ties of employing a Negro worker."

In some cases boards have discussed employing Negro social workers and are favorable toward it, but are afraid that the Negro workers would not be accepted by their clients or the white community.

Administrators were asked to list methods that might be used to improve employment opportunities for Negro social workers. Most of the responses listed such general factors as: developing total program so that general staff could be increased and a Negro worker employed; chaning community attitudes toward Negroes, wonking out specialzed programs, and increaed number of Negroes training in social work.

Several cited the influence of Negro leaders ~~xxxxxxxx~~ in ~~bringing the need for~~ a securing a Negro social worker in their own ~~xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx~~ TYpcical-- welfa e departments. A superintendent wrote, "The members of the Negro Civic Club came to the office and requested a worker. I consented and discussed the matter with the county commissioners, who approved it. As a result, a Negro worker was employed and has done an excellent job. I believe that representa ive Negro groups could do much to increase the employment of Negro social workers."

State personnel officers are in a strategic position to promote employment Of Negro workers. The personnel director of the Fla. State Welfare Board, for example, notifies all District Directors when a Negro social worker makes application for employment through the State Personnell Office or successfully passes the merit examination. As a result of this procedure, the employment of Negro social workers has been discussed in all twelve of the Florida administrative districts and the counties in these districts where large Negro populations are located. This method, according to many administraors and supervisors, is conducive to ~~the~~ focusing ~~of~~ more attention on the discussion employment of Negro social workers than is found in other states included in the study. Mr; Larkins found also that the State Director of Personnel in Tennessee had been responsible for discussion and consideration of Negro personnel, and as a result of these discussions, the employment of several Negro workers was approved when additional funds became available.

Most often mentioned ~~specific~~ problems confronting the Negro social worker ~~included~~ limited opportunities and restrictions on advancements. ~~As one expressed by one Negro worker,~~ As one worker put it, "The basic major problems are not in securing employment in the public welfare program, but in securing the ultimate in professional promo ion on the job." Workers listed other problems related to their racial origin:

(1) racial discrimination
(2) lack of respect for the achievements and abilities of Negroes
(3) acceptance of supervision from individuals withless education and expreience
(4) inablibil ty to advance beyoje the casework level
(5) low salaries that accompnay cas work positions
(6) general community attitudes and conditions related toworking in public welfare in this region
(7) the absence of opportunities to participate in professional institutes, meetings, and organizations
(8) lack of support of Negro community leaders both in the securing of employment and after work was on the job
(9) absence of professional schools of social work in the region, resulting in many being unable to change their classifications by securing more education
(10) general attitudes of the other staff members, the community and clients were discouraging.

A-3 A study of infectious diseases in families

ABSTRACT:

Types of data: Observation of all illnessess occurring in a group of families.

Purposes: Characterization of illnesses clinically, epidemiologically, and, insofar as possible, by laboratory procedures. Differentiation of known entities and the study of their behavior. Investigation of possible entities of unknown etiology. Study of specific problems.

Population: A group of about 70 families from the Heights area of greater Cleveland. Each family has one or more young children.

Method of obtaining data: Weekly visits by a field worker, visits by a staff physician at times of illness, daily record of symptoms kept by mother, periodic physical examinations.

Stage of progress: Have completed 4 years of study and are about to publish on experience of first 3 years. ('47-'58)

A-4 Canadian Sickness Survey

ABSTRACT: The object of the Canadian Sickness Survey was to obtain estimates of the incidence and prevalence of illness and accidents, the amount of medical, nursing, and other health care received, and the volume of family expenditures for medicines, medical charges, hospital bills, prepayment plans, and other health services.

The survey method consisted of personal visits by trained lay interviewers to a sample of approximately 40,000 persons in about 10,000 households distributed throughout each of the 10 provinces. In designing the sample, extensive use was made of population, social and economic data obtained from the 1941 Census material. In most cases fourteen visits were made during a twelve-month period to each household in the sample. On the first visit, the interviewer, after introducing the survey, left a special calendar designed to help the informant keep a day-to-day record of current illness and expenditures for each member of the household. Three standard record forms were used by the interviewer: Household Record, an Individual Sickness Record and an Expenditures Form.

Analysis of the data is continuing. ('50-indef.)

A-5 Prevalence of chronic illness and disabilities as determined by a random sample survey of the population

ABSTRACT: Types of data to be collected and purpose: This survey will attempt to collect data on the prevalence of chronic ailments and debilitating conditions and the relationship of these to inability to participate in gainful employment, the amount and type of medical, nursing and other care needed and received, and how this occurs in the population as to race, age, occupation, etc. The purpose of these data will be to attempt to evaluate the size of the local problem as to the care of chronic and disabling diseases with particular reference to the need for chronic and convalescent hospital beds and services, rehabilitation, recreation, and for use by various industrial groups to help determine employment practices.

Population: The population under observation will be the City of Richmond, Virginia, which is made up primarily of locally born residents of whom two-thirds are white. The economic level of this population is probably average for the country or slightly higher. It is undoubtedly somewhat more stable than most.

Method of obtaining data: Data will be obtained by questionnaires filled out by actual interview. The interviewers will probably be graduate students in the Dept. of Sociology of the Univ. of Richmond. They will interview a cross section of the population, which will roughly be one percent of the total population. The sample will be chosen by a random method, the details of which have not as yet been determined.

Stage of progress: At present the Committee is working on the preparation of a questionnaire. No definite work dates have as yet been established. ('52-indef.)

A-6 Survey of chronic illness in Mercer County (New Jersey)

ABSTRACT:

Purpose and types of data: The survey was made to determine the actual number of persons with chronic disease in Mercer County, and the measure of their needs. Data were gathered for age, race, sex, income status of the family, as well as causes of illness for the persons having a chronic disease. It was thus possible to establish a rate for chronic illness in the county.

Population: A sample of 500 households covering Trenton and the surrounding area of Mercer County was utilized. Every 117th household was visited, 335 households in the city itself and 165 in the outlying district. A total of 1,987 persons was interviewed.

Method of obtaining data: A schedule consisting of eleven questions designed to bring out the desired information was drawn up and printed on cards for the interviewers to use. Volunteer interviewers made calls in Trenton, while 5 nurses from the staff of the Visiting Nurse Association made the 165 calls outside.

Stage of progress: All the interviewing was done between April 10 and April 30, 1950. Analysis of the data, with recommendations for future action, has been published. ('49-'50)

A-25 National Survey of Old-Age Insurance Beneficiaries

ABSTRACT: As part of the nation-wide survey made by the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance, certain information was obtained on the number of weeks that the old-age beneficiary or the spouse had spent in a hospital or in bed at home during the survey year. Other information obtained related to living arrangements, benefits, employment, income, net worth, other financial data, identity and cooperativeness of informants.

The major objectives of the survey were to answer such questions as the following:

1. How nearly adequate are the retirement resources of beneficiaries to-day?
2. How are beneficiaries with inadequate retirement resources managing to get along?
3. To what extent did the increase in benefits improve the economic situation of the beneficiaries?
4. If the benefit formula is changed again, which beneficiary types and which benefit brackets should be given the greatest consideration?
5. What is the present economic situation of couples with non-entitled wives?
6. How do the resources of beneficiaries living in large cities differ from those in smaller localities?

The people interviewed were selected from a 1-percent national sample of old-age beneficiaries whose benefits were in force in 1950 and who were living in the fall of 1951 when the interviewing took place. The beneficiary was part of a "beneficiary group" for purposes of this survey; the "group" included not only the old-age beneficiary but also the spouse and unmarried children under age 18 living under one roof, even though the spouse or children were not entitled to benefits.

A-26 Survey of hospitalized illness, hospital utilization, and hospitalization insurance in the noninstitutional population of the United States 65 years and older

ABSTRACT: Types of data: For persons 65 years and older, the number of persons with one or more hospitalized illnesses (hospital experiences) in 1951, the number of admissions, and the number of days of hospital care in the year were obtained. Data were collected with reference to the insured status of the individuals--so that hospitalization and utilization rates of insured and uninsured persons can be compared. The data also yield distribution of persons and days of care by duration of hospital care and information on how the hospital bills of hospitalized aged persons were met.

Population under observation: The sample yields data applicable to the entire noninstitutional population (in this study, restricted to those 65 years and older as of March 1952). The data are presented by age, sex, color, urban-rural residence, and labor force status.

Method of obtaining the data: Through the cooperation of the Bureau of the Census, special questions were added to the Monthly Survey of the Labor Force, and the answers were obtained in household interviews.

Stage of progress: The results of the survey have been summarized in an article of the Social Security Bulletin. (Jan.-Dec., '52)

A-27 The effects of occupational retirement in the United States upon physical and mental morbidity and mortality

ABSTRACT: This is a longitudinal study for seven years, on a nationwide basis, which seeks to test the hypothesis that chronological, abrupt, mandatory, involuntary, and unplanned forms of retirement accelerate physical and mental morbidity and aggravate the symptoms of senescence among the gainfully employed upon their retirement. The research objective is to measure and to determine the reasons for differentials in morbidity and mortality between retirants and non-retirants. Retirants are being further specified and compared in terms of the following types of retirement: (a) voluntary versus involuntary, (b) gradual versus abrupt, (c) planned versus unplanned, (d) partial versus complete.

The pursuit of this objective began in 1951 with 2 pilot studies. The first was conducted in an industrial plant; the second was a community study. The plant questionnaire was designed for workers 60 years of age and over; the community questionnaire for a cross-section of those 60 years of age and over.

These pilot studies in turn are starting points for (1) a nationwide urban survey of a cross-section of 1,000 males and 200 females 60 years of age and over, (2) a rural survey in 6 counties in New York State, and, beginning in July, 1952, (3) a series of longitudinal "in-plant" studies of retirement all over the country. Here a selection scheme is being employed which takes into account variables such as geographical distribution, number of employees, type of economic activity, major occupations, retirement policy and union organization. Subjects are selected who are 64 years of age.

Results will be analyzed according to the different patterns of retirement or continued employment and according to the other variables hypothesized as affecting adjustment in retirement. By interviews, self-administered questionnaires, and physical examinations conducted by company physicians, a long-range check will be made on the morbidity and mortality as well as the adjustment of the different categories of subjects. Annual interviews and medical checkups will continue with those who survive until 70 years of age. During the seventh year of the study, when the subjects reach their 70th year of age, a comprehensive and developmental report will be made along with a final analysis of morbidity and mortality. A-36 Survey on the economic aspects of prolonged non-occupational illness among employed persons

ABSTRACT: The study will establish how extensive a problem prolonged non-occupational illness is among employed persons in private industry throughout the country; whether any action is necessary; the types of action which might be taken; and the areas in which action is necessary. The study will determine the relation of the incidence and duration of prolonged illness to: (1) different occupational groups; (2) different income groups; (3) age; (4) sex; (5) various types of employee benefit plans and the coverages available under these plans; (6) medical facilities within employing establishment; (7) availability and use of medical facilities in the community.

At least 400,000 employees are to be surveyed (1% sample of the nation's private non-agricultural employment). Preceded by months of research in testing data and developing procedures, the study is now under way in over 100 establishments representing some 20 industries. They are currently reporting the illness experience of over 100,000 workers. All illnesses of more than four consecutive weeks are being examined, with the exception of pregnancy and workmen's compensation cases. The nature of the illness, the treatment being followed, the cost of the treatment, and how the cost is being met, are being investigated. ('52-indef.)

A-37 Morbidity in summer and winter as measured by physicians' services provided through a comprehensive prepayment plan in an industrial city

ABSTRACT: Types of data: Monthly prevalence rates for two months, February, 1949 and July, 1951, on patients seeing physicians, by 10 leading causes of morbidity (International List, 1948), by broad disease groups, age, and sex. Rates of calls by type of call (home, office, hospital, night), by age and sex.

Population: 75,000 subscribers and dependents in the Windsor Medical Services, Windsor, Ontario. (See A-43.) This population base comprises half of the City of Windsor.

Method of obtaining data: Examination of operating records.

Stage of progress: February, 1949 data completed; starting on July, 1951 data.

A-38 Collection, analysis, and publication of statistics on the sickness benefit program established by the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act

ABSTRACT: Types of data and purpose: Data are collected on the number of payments and amount of benefits, number and personal characteristics of beneficiaries, and frequency, duration, and type of sickness for which benefits are paid. The purpose of the study is to analyze the operations and effect of the sickness benefit program.

Population: The persons under observation are railroad employees with sufficient base-year earnings to qualify for benefits.

Method of obtaining data: Data are obtained currently from wage records, and from claim folders and payment records for a 10-percent sample of beneficiaries.

Stage of progress: Analytical data for each benefit year (July 1 – June 30) are available about 4 months after the end of the year.

Frequency rates obtained understate the true frequency of sickness substantially because of the effect of turnover in employment, payment of other social insurance benefits, paid sick leave, and damage settlements. ('48 – cont.)

A-39 Utilization of physicians' services by enrollees of the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York (HIP)

ABSTRACT: Purpose: The data are needed primarily to maintain a continuous record on the utilization of physicians' services to see if the rate of utilization is remaining below the level upon which premium charges and capitation payments to physicians are established. The data also serve to answer various other administrative questions and provide the basis for special studies on pediatric service; maternity care; medical care given to aged enrollees; differential rates of total utilization by medical group and by age and sex; the volume and kind of services rendered in various physician specialties, etc.

The basic unit of reporting is a visit to an HIP physician or a visit by the physician to the patient at home or in the hospital. The report includes a statement on the diagnosis and/or treatment. These visit reports (form "Med 10") are sent in each month by all physicians in the medical groups who saw any HIP patients. There are 30 of these medical groups scattered throughout the boroughs; they are composed of general family physicians and specialists.

In comparison to the general population, HIP has a considerable deficiency of young adults and the aged, a small excess of children of elementary and junior high school ages, and a larger excess of enrollees aged 35-44 years, of males particularly. ('47- cont.)

A-97 Studies of the epidemiology of enteric infections

ABSTRACT:

Types of data and purpose:

1. Environmental data and socioeconomic data: location and type of water source, type of excreta disposal, structural quality of the house, esthetic quality of the house and surroundings, and socioeconomic data for each family cultured or visited. Purpose is to determine environmental factors influencing spread of communicable diseases which may aid in establishing control procedures.
2. Culturing data: rectal swab cultures of children under 10 years of age, to determine the prevalence of Shigella and Salmonella organisms in the study area. Twenty-nine thousand five hundred cultures were obtained in the course of these investigations.
3. Morbidity data: For two years (1949-1950) morbidity survey data consisted of reported disease identities from 2,300 families, and for two years (1952 and 1953) symptoms of illness reported from 1,100 families were collected.

Population: Study blocks were selected in two cities (populations 15,000 and 10,000), and in nine rural towns (population 300 to 1,200) of southwest Georgia. These study blocks were selected from neighborhoods having the greatest proportion of children under 10 years of age. All households in these blocks were visited and children under 10 years were cultured. The number of this age group included was disproportionate to that expected in the normal population since it has the greatest incidence of infection and disease due to Shigella organisms.

Method of obtaining data: Each household was visited monthly and questioned by a lay enumerator as to illnesses experienced by each individual. Monthly rectal swab cultures were obtained independently by a nurse-team from all cooperative children under 10 in the study areas.

Stage of progress: The project was initiated January 1949 and field work completed December 1953. Analysis on the basis of culturing data is to be published. Analysis of morbidity is continuing.

A-98 Study of the rate of growth and chemical composition of fingernails in health and disease

ABSTRACT: Types of data and purpose: This study represents an attempt, through establishment of standards for an apparently normal person, to determine if significant differences are observed in diseased states, with the possibility that nail growth might ultimately provide one index of health.

(1) Rate of growth of fingernails in apparently healthy subjects in an endeavor to determine "normal" growth rates and variations and effects of sex, age, race, occupation and intercurrent minor illness.
(2) Rate of growth of fingernails in patients with established diseases, for comparison with "normal" figures.
(3) Chemical analysis of nails for sulphur and nitrogen contents in apparent normal and diseased subjects.

Population: Apparently normal subjects, predominantly medical students and nursing students, with fewer subjects in the older and younger age groups; also patients in ante-partum clinic.

Method of obtaining data:

(1) History of personal health, habits and past illnesses
(2) Measurement of fingernail growth at intervals
(3) Health records and running accounts of health and habits
(4) Chemical analysis of fingernails

Stage of progress: Approximately 300 persons, predominantly "normal" control group, undergoing regular nail growth measurements. Methodology for chemical analysis being developed. ('53-'57)

A-101 Butler County (Pennsylvania) Health Program Evaluation Study

ABSTRACT: Types of data and purpose: The purpose of this series of studies is to evaluate the activities of a newly created county health department. As a first step, a survey of 900 households in the county was conducted June 14 to July 15, 1954. This survey was aimed at obtaining basic demographic, social, economic, morbidity, disability and impairment, and health facilities use statistics for the county. Later studies will be directed at devising indices and obtaining the requisite data to measure the impact of the work of the health unit in the county.

Population: All persons in households resident in Butler County, Pennsylvania, on July 1, 1954.

Method of obtaining data: The survey completed on July 15 was based on personal interview of 900 households. Two clusters of an average size of three households apiece were selected at random from each of 150 geographic strata in a single stage through an area sampling technique.

Stage of progress: Analysis of the initial survey data is now in progress and plans for additional studies are under preparation. (Jan. '54-Dec. '56)

A-102 Health insurance coverage in the United States and its impact on the distribution of the cost of family personal health services--Project II

ABSTRACT: Types of data and purpose: To study the relationships of the total costs for personal health services of subscriber-households in selected health insurance plans with the portion of such costs covered by the health insurance plans; also for what services during a year the plans were used. (See A-63 of Clearinghouse Listing Number 2.)

As a second phase, the study will seek similar information, but more extensively and intensively within specific communities.

This is not primarily a morbidity survey, but a survey of medical costs and the effectiveness of health insurance.

Population: Probability sample of households enrolled in the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Plans in Boston, Massachusetts, and Birmingham, Alabama, and a private insurance company in Boston.

Method of obtaining data: Interviews of families in their homes.

Stage of progress: Tabulations are in progress. (Nov. '53-early summer '55)

A-99 The Massachusetts Chronic Disease Survey of 1953

ABSTRACT:

Types of data and purpose: The data collected in this survey consisted of several types including: (1) hereditary history, (2) chronic disease history, (3) socioeconomic history, and (4) occupational history. For the publication given below, however, only the history on several chronic diseases was used in an effort to ascertain whether or not the incidence of chronic disease had increased or decreased since the statewide survey in Massachusetts in 1930.

Population: The areas and group under survey were predominantly rural, although several industries are located in the area and part of the population consisted of suburbanites who commute to the city of Worcester. These communities (Arlington, Nashoba, Waltham and Brookfield) were thought to be ideally suited to produce the type of information desired.

Method of obtaining data: The data were obtained by interview of the survey population.

Stage of progress at present: Project is completed. The collection of data began July 21, 1953, and in February 1954 the paper was sent in for publication.

A-100 Effect of housing on health and social adjustment of Negro families

ABSTRACT:

Types of data:
(1) Morbidity
(2) Family living characteristics (sociological survey)
(3) Health practices
(4) Data designed to obtain an index of mental health

Population:
(1) 400 Negro families admitted to public housing from slum environment
(2) 600 control Negro families residing in slum

Method of obtaining data:
(1) Morbidity: by home visits bimonthly with interview plus a search of hospital records.
(2) Sociological survey: by home visits once yearly and by a search of social service records.

Stage of progress:
(1) The morbidity instrument is nearing the final draft.
(2) The social survey instrument is due for a pretest.

A-107 Cultural factors effecting rural morbidity

ABSTRACT:

Types of data and purpose: This study is a logical development in our long-time plan for research in rural health; we believe we are making progress toward an understanding of the decision-making process with respect to the health problems of rural people.

The purpose of the study is to determine the effect of isolation and ecological remoteness on attitude toward sickness, and the awareness and use of organized health services. Level of living, education, income and employment of rural people are being investigated. These data and an inventory of health resources are being collected.

Population: County situations covering the range of least developed to most developed areas of rural living and representing widely different levels of living and of socioeconomic status are being studied. A random sample of from 5 to 10 percent of rural families in each county of study was selected.

Method of obtaining data: (1) Family interview, (2) interviews with public officials and officials of private agencies, including health practitioners.

Stage of progress: Exploratory work is completed in one county; in 1955, plans call for an extension into two or three additional counties. (July '54-'56)

A-110 Health hazards in the uranium mines and milling industry

ABSTRACT:

Types of data and purpose: Morbidity and mortality data on uranium miners are being compiled. Also being compiled are data from environmental studies on radiation levels in mines.

Population: A group in excess of 1,500 uranium miners has been established; also a group in excess of 600 mill workers. The groups have been established to be basically healthy.

Method of obtaining data: The groups have been interviewed, occupational histories obtained, and physical examinations performed.

Stage of progress: The groups are now being followed through personal contact, mail contact, and contact with personal physicians, and will continue to be followed indefinitely. ('50-'70 or '75)
